Sniper suspects detained

Army veteran, teenager arrested hours after descriptions released

By Stephen Manning
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

FREDERICK, Md. — One of America's most extraordinary manhunts culminated Thursday in the arrests of an Army veteran and a teenager, asleep at a roadside rest stop — both of whom authorities believe are the perpetrators of a bloody, three-week sniping spree that left 10 people dead and multitudes paralyzed by fear.

Montgomery County State's Attorney Douglas Gansler said state and federal prosecutors would meet Friday morning to discuss charges against John Allen Muhammad, 41, and 17-year-old John Lee Malvo. But law-enforcement sources told The Associated Press investigators were certain they had the culprits.

Fire damage at $37,000; cause unclear

Structure's 2 occupants lost $7,000 in belongings

By Pete Elsasser
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A fire Wednesday afternoon at 1231 Laramie St. caused $30,000 in structural damage and $7,000 in damage to personal belongings, a local fire official said.

Jerry Snyder, Manhattan Fire Department assistant chief, said the cause is unknown. He said department officials probably won't ever know exactly what caused the fire.

"The fire started in a bedroom on or around a couch," Snyder said. "Someone had been smoking in the room earlier in the day."

Snyder said the house was occupied by two men, James Haas and Chad Sallman. They could not be reached Wednesday.

Snyder said the occupants didn't have renter's insurance, and the American Red Cross is assisting the two residents.

Ben Kearns, property supervisor for McCullough Development Inc., said McCullough had contacted the two occupants Wednesday concerning the fire.

He said McCullough put the occupants up in a room following the fire, and they're currently trying to find suitable, available housing.

Students crowd off-campus streets with cars

By Amy Preston

Each day, when Naomi Fisher walks home from class, she can't believe all the cars parked up and down the street she lives on.

When the senior in architectural engineering leaves her house in the morning, cars are in front of her house on Ratone Street.

When she walks home from class in the afternoon, cars are still lined up and down the street.

It seems that each time she looks out her window or walks out the door, all she sees are cars.

"I didn't realize that so many people park their cars this far away from campus," she said.

Fisher is not alone. Manhattan residents living blocks away from campus often find their front sidewalks the equivalent of the school's parking lot.

Brad Schoen, patrol division captain for the Riley County Police Department, said residents often times get frustrated at the number of cars parked up and down the streets near the university.

"People call in all the time complaining about this," he said. "Anytime K-State is in

Colleges feel effects of budget cuts, prepare for more to come

Salina campus focuses on maintaining education

By Jessica Pitts
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Maintaining quality education is on the top of Dean Dennis Kuhlman's list as he reviews ways to cut the College of Technology and Aviation's budget.

"It is hard," Kuhlman said, "but we have to maintain a level of excellence."

Reductions

The college, hit by a $240,002 cut, began by reducing the budget in three key areas.

The first was a decrease in the amount of planned new equipment.

"We just cut the upgrade," Kuhlman said. "We decided we could still educate our students on the equipment we presently own without sacrificing their education."

The second step, cutting expenditures, affected all areas of the Salina campus, including telephone usage, out-of-state travel, utilities and subscriptions to professional journals.

"Every unit on campus took a cut, with the exception of the library," he said. "The library has an emphasis on student learning, so we left that alone."

Last, five faculty positions were not filled for this school year.

"Even though we have these vacancies, we were able to get around cutting classes because of some efficiency changes in the class schedule," Kuhlman said.

Those changes, which students can expect to see more of in the spring, were the result of an audit on how class offerings are related to degree requirements, he said.

"We look at what classes

Budget cuts

The Collegian is exploring the effects of budget cuts made by the Kansas Legislature by analyzing each of K-State's 9 colleges, along with services that affect students. With mid-year cuts that could be detrimental to the university, higher education funding has become a top issue in November's elections.

Vet Med forced to slash $1.3 million in spending

By Jessica Pitts
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

There will be another budget cut. Dean Ralph Richardson has no doubt.

And while he knows there is no way to avoid it, he also is unsure about where the funds to cover it will come from.

"We are trying to find ways to increase our resources," said Richardson, dean of the College of Veterinary Medicine. "To survive in the future, we are going to have to look towards grants, gifts and increasing our students."

The college was hit with a $1.3 million cut after the Kansas Legislature ended the longest session in history last spring. K-State was left with $7.9 million less in spending power, and Veterinary Medicine was targeted for large reductions.

"It hit us hard," Richardson said. "The cut had to come from several areas."

Those areas include the following:

■ About a $107,000 decrease in mid-year salary increases.

■ A cut in covering the increasing cost of health insurance, adding up to about $330,000.

■ About $111,000 reduction in Agriculture Experimental Stations.

■ A cutback totaling about $118,000 in campus infrastructures (computerized student records, for example).

■ A decrease in travel, postage and other miscellaneous items totaling about $64,000.

■ A $216,000 reduction of utility bills.

Powercat provides business revenue

By Emily Meissen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

From their T-shirts to Powercat tattoos to purple beads, K-State fans are known for their purple pride — and they show it.

The sale of K-State sports apparel is one of Manhattan retailers' largest sources of revenue.

With the success and popularity of the football team comes an increase in purchasing of K-State merchandise.

"Three-quarters of our sales are from August to January 1," said Leah Sobba, apparel and gift manager at Varney's Book Store. "It's a huge difference during football season. When there are 50,000 fans coming in for the game, that's a pretty major deal."

In 1986, licensing revenue was around $7,000, said John Fairman, assistant vice president for institutional advancement. Two years later, with the arrival of Coach Bill Snyder and the introduction of the Powercat logo, revenue jumped to more than $32,000. In 1994, sales broke $200,000 for the first time. Last season, sales reached a record high of more than $700,000, he said.

"It really relates to what happens with football," Fairman said. "Football is the engine that drives everything. With any Division I school, 60 percent of revenue is generated by football."

Steve Lowman, retail manager at Ballard's Sporting Goods, agrees that gamedays are the busiest days, when the average sale on a game day is from $10 to $30, he said.

While Lowman said big games like Texas, Nebraska and USC bring in more shoppers, Sobba said the time of the game affects business more.

"If there is a night game, we have a much better day," she said. "People have time to come shop and still tailgate before the game. We sell a lot to people who come in from out of town on game days. But the most remarkable thing is the people from here that we see every weekend."

A closer look

Many of the issues at K-State also affect some of America's other universities. Campus Connection offers a side-by-side view of how some of them are addressed here and at other schools.

Athletics basis for USC apparel sales

By Merrill Balassone
DAILY TROJAN

LOS ANGELES — A Rose Bowl win in 1996. A baseball national championship in 1998. And a men's tennis national championship in 2001.

Not only did these titles maintain the University of Southern California's reputation for athletics excellence, it also renewed school spirit and support for Trojan teams.

Many students choose to show their support by purchasing USC athletic gear. Purchases of USC athletic gear are directly related to the success of an athletic team, said Dan Stimmler, executive director of the bookstore.

Football typically has been the biggest money-maker, Stimmler said. Following a win, the bookstore will be packed for at least an hour. After a loss, the place is empty.

"We started the season off 2-0 and the place was on fire," he added.

November and December is the busiest time of year for bookstore apparel sales because of the holiday season, the Notre Dame-USC game, the UCLA-USC game and bowl season, Stimmler said.

Adrienne Dameron, sophomore in music industry, said she buys apparel from the bookstore during the holiday season because it is a convenient place to find gifts for family and friends.

Basketball also has developed a loyal following, especially with the popularity of Coach Henry Bibby. Sales of basketball-related gear have doubled each of the last three years, Stimmler said.

For USC, a Rose Bowl appearance could mean $1 million to $1.5 million in extra apparel sales, Stimmler said.

For schools such as UCLA that have a strong basketball tradition, a national championship would generate the same numbers as a Rose Bowl appearance for USC. After the 1994-95 basketball national championship, the Associated Students of UCLA generated an additional $1 million in sales, ASUCLA General Merchandise Manager Patrick Healey told the Daily Bruin.

Wildcats win registration war

K-State registers 3 times as many students as KU

By Crystal Welborn
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Look for a little extra purple in the stands when K-State plays the University of Kansas on Nov. 2.

KU lost the first-ever Cat's Challenge voting drive Oct. 12.

The challenge was to see which of the two schools could get a higher amount of students registered to vote in the upcoming elections Nov. 5.

The conditions were that the Student Governing Association members of the losing school had to wear the opposing team's colors when the rivals played each other.

Zac Cook, student body president, said this experience was positive both for the schools and for the state.

"This shows they're egotistical about their ability, and they are over confident," he said.

"It's positive for the state to have all of these students involved with the process."

Cook said there will be an announcement at the football game so people can find the KU students in purple.

K-State registered 453 voters, almost three times more than KU. Cook said the representatives from KU already have issued excuses for their loss.

"They conceded that their football team is horrible and that they wanted to tally by attendance at the game, but either way, we blew them out of the water. We had three times as many students registered," he said.

Cook said he wasn't sure if the Cat's Challenge would continue into the future, but said he hopes it will.

"That will be up to the student leaders of the future. I hope so," he said.

"We will leave a big memo about it."

Emily King, SGA member who coordinated the event, said she is excited about the win, but hopes students take the next step.

"I really hope since the students registered that they vote," King said.

"We all have opinions in politics - we should put them into action."

Officials hope Jardine redevelopment survey determines possible price range, floor plans

New questionnaire builds on success of last spring's student feedback

By Amy Preston
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Plans for redevelopments of the Jardine Terrace apartment area are in a new stage as the Department of Housing and Dining Services sent out an online survey to students this week.

The survey, compiled by Brailsford and Dunlavey of Washington, D.C., has a number of differences from the one conducted in spring 2002.

"The first survey was done specifically to determine if students would be interested in us pursuing the redevelopment area of Jardine apartments," said Bob Burgess, associate director for housing and dining administrative services.

"The responses that came back indicated that an overwhelming majority of students on campus felt that the redevelopment was good to explore."

Burgess said between 4,000 and 5,000 students responded to the first survey.

After all survey results were counted, information from the first survey was compiled by Brailsford and Dunlavey, then summarized and presented to Housing and Dining Services.

"The survey results from the first one have been good, and we've had really good participation," said Skyler Harper, assistant director of Housing and Dining Services.

"The consultants said that we had one of the highest percentage of returns."

In addition, Burgess said he thinks the responses have helped continue the process for future changes to Jardine apartments.

The second survey, Burgess

"What's being explored is a variety of living-style options for students."

Bob Burgess
ASSISTANT DIRECTOR OF HOUSING AND DINING ADMINISTRATIVE SERVICES

said, is projected to find out what students at K-State would be looking for as far as price ranges and floor-plan options.

"What's being explored is a variety of living-style options for students," he said.

"We want to continue having the mix of students at Jardine and to give that entire body more options."

While the survey results will be targeted at the changes to the Jardine area, the survey is intended for students who live both on and off campus.

Burgess said the survey results from both groups are important for the renovations of the housing developments.

"Students who live off campus have just as viable feelings as those who live in the residence halls and on campus," he said.

"The more students we can ask questions to, the more valid the survey will be in the long run."

The surveys were sent via e-mail to the student body earlier this week. In addition, all students who complete surveys will be eligible for a variety of prizes, ranging from a PALM pilot to gift certificates for local restaurants.

Surveys must be completed by Nov. 1 for students to be eligible for prizes.

While results from the second survey are weeks away, Harper said Housing and Dining Services officials have been planning for the results.

"The survey numbers and the data we get from it will determine what we can afford, and from there on we'll decide where we want to go from there," he said.

TO THE POINT City, task force shouldn't forget about recycling

Manhattan needs a recycling program.

Recently, the Manhattan City Commission voted no to a request to obtain bids for curbside recycling. The plan, developed by the Mayor's Recycling Task Force, has been in progress since August 2001.

City commissioners said they voted no to the request because they need more information before asking for contractors' bids.

The task force needs to work to create a more thorough plan that will show commissioners the program's feasibility.

Recycling will benefit Manhattan's economy and environment. A community attitude survey conducted in 1999 showed that 87 percent of the Manhattan area respondents would be willing to pay for the service.

It is certainly valid that the commissioners feel they need more information before moving forward with the project.

Task force members should take what the commission says to heart. The plan has been stalled, but that doesn't mean a more comprehensive plan won't be approved in the future.

If commissioners and task force members work together, the proposed plan may become a reality in the near future.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

BAD SIGNS

Gubernatorial candidates cheapen race with weak platforms; media should ask pointed questions to challenge politicians

In a column about the two leading gubernatorial candidates, it might seem surprising I don't plan to discuss taxes and education.

It's not my fault. Blame Tim Shallenburger and Kathleen Sebelius.

When the focus of their campaigns should be on these critical issues, they have cheapened their debates with personal attacks and insulted voters' intellects with television rhetoric.

Unfortunately, the professional media are not doing enough to correct this situation.

Here's a bad sign: The highlight of the campaign season is a remark Sebelius made about Sept. 11 being not nearly as frightening as Missouri highways.

Though obviously insensitive and damaging to her public image, this comment is not the sort of thing that should decide a gubernatorial election. Yet the perception is that it is a critical issue, simply because it has earned so much coverage.

Regarding the funding questions, both candidates have been promoting basically the same things. And what they have been pledging is not very substantial.

A cynical Wichita Eagle editorial board from Oct. 11 said, "But when the candidates are mostly saying the same thing about the budget — all together now: 'Cut waste, improve efficiency' — differences on social issues could prove decisive."

The Wichita Eagle might be right to criticize, but it should do more than offer sarcastic jabbs. The editorial needs to come out and make a straightforward statement. It doesn't go far enough in chastising the candidates.

I agree social issues will be decisive, but only because the news media have not demanded accountability from Sebelius and Shallenburger on hard issues.

Clearly, the candidates are not going to be forthcoming or passionate about their intentions, so only the press, acting on behalf of voters, can pry real, responsible answers out of them.

But it's too late for this election. It's inevitable that social issues will be the yardstick voters use to compare the candidates.

One Wichita poll showed one-third of voters regarded education as the most important issue, and almost 25 percent thought taxes were the primary concern. Only one in 25 selected abortion as a top issue, yet the candidates' stances on abortion will be easier for voters to contrast.

According to the aforementioned Eagle editorial, Shallenburger supports parental notification and generally opposes late-term abortions. As a religious conservative, he would seem to attract pro-lifers.

Sebelius, on the other hand, was a leader in the pro-choice movement during her legislative days. She opposes parental notification and sees no need for changes to current abortion law.

ANDREW LAWSON

Many Republicans in Kansas are very passionate about gun rights, especially the right to carry concealed weapons. As long as citizens have no history of drug use, Shallenburger supports their concealed-carry rights. Sebelius would restrict that right to retired law enforcement officers. She also opposes assault weapons, according to the Eagle editorial.

This isn't to suggest that education, budgeting, and taxation haven't been addressed at all. Sebelius attacked Shallenburger in a debate for suggesting a 3-percent cut in education — $69 million — was more desirable than a hike in taxes.

For a while, that debate concentrated on the important issues, but it eventually gave way to more hemming and hawing. Both candidates said they wouldn't know where they could cut and streamline the budget until they take office.

This is unacceptable. Here is another instance in which pointed questions from the news media might have given us some real answers. But we also need to hold the candidates responsible for not being ardent enough to attack the issues that should be important to them.

Until the news media and the candidates cooperate, we will continue to judge Sebelius and Shallenburger primarily by their traditional positions on social issues.

Reflecting on good times helps avoid excessive stress

KATHRYN HOLLINGSWORTH

It can motivate, destroy and consume you. The origin is hidden somewhere in the past. It has no beginning and no end.

Stress sucks.

Let's face it: the middle of the semester is a reality check. Courses are heating up and professors are bearing down. Classes, exams, extra-curricular activities, parties and work can become overwhelming. The weekend, once a time of rest, is a memory. It's now a two-day hell to do what you put off during the week.

When stress is overwhelming, some of us feel so overwhelmed we can't do anything.

A hidden rebellion arises within us, and we take on the attitude that doing homework is futile. This is when your grades take a dive.

If classes and time constraints aren't stressful enough, just reflect upon the debt you are amassing as each year passes. Still not enough? Ponder the questions posed to us by friends and family: What are you going to do when you get out of school? Are you changing your major again? Have you found an internship yet? How is your résumé coming along?

What do we do when it all becomes too much?

There are options. We can cry, sleep, study more, drink, exercise or get a massage.

I don't suggest any of this in excess.

What would happen if we forgot about ourselves and our future plans for an instant?

I don't know — what would happen if I took an hour out of my day to do something for someone else without thinking about it as an asset to my résumé under the communityservice section? This is a mind-blowing thought.

Most of us are so busy planning our futures that we are destroying our present.

We push ourselves at this frantic pace in search of a high-paying job we love, dream house, new car, travel, prestige and power.

But getting wrapped up in our little, planned lives is causing us to forget there is more to life than passing tests.

Our problems consume us, and we become so absorbed with what we want to accomplish that nothing else matters.

Let's be realistic — it's never going to get better.

When we finish college and get a job, we'll be fighting for a promotion. After we find the perfect mate we'll be considering children. The big decisions never stop, and stress will always be rearing its ugly head and trying to steal our joy.

Take a second — forget about your future — and focus on the good things in your life.

Turn off CNN and turn on Comedy Central. Take a walk without thinking about how many calories you're burning. Call your parents just to talk — don't ask for money. Go to sleep without counting the exact amount of hours you are going to get.

Stress isn't always the devil — we just need to learn moderation.

Stress can aid as a motivating factor, and when we allow it to benefit us, becoming a well-rounded individual is a possibility.

God put us on Earth for a reason. This reason does not include having a panic attack.

We are lucky to be here and have the opportunity to benefit from our education. However, the point of college is to gain a mind, not lose it over being obsessed with our success.

Recycling task force unsure of next step after city rejects bid proposal

Commission says group's presentation lacked information

By Jessica Pitts
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The next step in implementing a curbside recycling program in Manhattan is unknown, task force members said, after the City Commission voted no to a request to obtain bids.

"I am definitely disappointed," said Judy Willingham, chair of the Mayor's Recycling Task Force. "I don't know where we will go at this point."

The task force was established in August 2001 after a community attitude survey in 1999 showed 87 percent of the respondents would pay from $1 to $5 per month, and 13 percent said they would pay $6 to $10 for the program. The task force was exploring possible ways to implement the program to include single-family residences in Manhattan.

Willingham said the next step was to ask for proposals from contractors so the task force and city could better estimate the cost of the program.

"We can't understand why they would have voted no to obtaining proposals," she said. "We were not asking for a yes or a no to the program. We just wanted to move forward."

Commissioner Mark Taussig, who voted no at the commission's Oct. 15 meeting, said the committee needed to have that information before asking for bids.

"The presentation and plan was incomplete," he said. "I wasn't ready to go for it with those pieces missing."

Those pieces included the following:

■ The number of residents who will choose to opt out of the recycling program. The task force is estimating that number at 25 percent, based on a similar program in Overland Park, Kan. Taussig said he is concerned the number might be higher and therefore not be profitable for the contractor. He also said the opt-out provision needs to be more specific.

"It is good that we have that option," Taussig said, "but do you opt out for a year, a lifetime? We need to have that in the proposal."

■ The 25 cents that would be charged to each serviced household per month for public education about the recycling program. If 75 percent of the households participate, as the task force estimated, that would generate $1,687.50 per month. Again, that number was extracted from other examples, Willingham said. But Taussig said he wants to know how that number was determined.

"If you really want this to be attractive, you have to keep the cost down," Taussig said at last Tuesday's Commission meeting. "I know $3 a year doesn't seem high, but you have to be able to justify that number."

■ The market value of recyclable material. Taussig said the proposal doesn't leave an option on how to get rid of recyclable material if there is not a market value for it.

"All it says is the contractor cannot throw it away," he said. "So, what is he supposed to do with it? We need to know how he will get rid of it."

Willingham, however, said the market value of recyclable material is extremely flexible, and there is no way to gauge that number exactly.

Materials that would be recycled in the initial phase would be No. 1 and No. 2 clear plastic beverage containers, aluminum beverage cans, steel cans and brown, green and clear glass bottles.

■ The amount it would cost the city. At the meeting, Sammi Mangus, assistant to the city manager, assured the commissioners that no new staff would be hired.

Commissioner Brad Everett, who voted no, said he was hesitant because he "really didn't want to see the city tied into it."

"I think there would be a need for additional staff," Everett said, "and if not additional staff, definitely additional hours from existing staff. It is not that I am against recycling, I just think it already happens in Manhattan. The city does not need to be pulled into it."

Everett said that once the program is established, a lot more cost will surface because the numbers are so vague now.

"That is when the public will begin to say no to the program. I am just not ready to approve this with that possibility still there," he said.

Willingham said that is why they were asking for bids.

"All we have is an estimate," she said, "and no one will know if it is a good estimate until we have a bid."

Commissioner Bruce Snead, who voted for the request, said it has to allow for flexibility in the bidding process.

"This would have put information in our hands," Snead said. "I think the proposal is well-crafted and tailored to the community, but until we get proposals from firms, it is hard to tell where we need to be."

Willingham said she isn't sure yet if the task force will present another proposal.

"We will see if there is a potential to revisit the issue," she said.

Despite Bears' dismal record, Cats not looking past Baylor

By Sean Purcell
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After an emotional loss to Texas last weekend, K-State now plays Baylor.

The Bears might be a team that's lucky to finally get its first-ever conference win this year.

But the Wildcats aren't approaching them as such, defensive tackle Terence Newman said.

"It's kind of like the first three games of the season. People always talk about playing cream-puff teams, and Baylor's not a cream-puff team," he said. "They are a very good team, they have guys that can make plays and they put points on the board against some real quality teams. So it's just something for us to improve on and get better this week."

One of those improvement areas will have to be running the football, running back coach Michael Smith said.

Baylor ranks seventh in the conference in run defense, and with the exception of New Mexico (198 yards rushing) and Colorado (270 yards rushing), the Bears have kept teams relatively in check in regards to the running attack.

"Those guys play hard, and they're just gap sound and they fit well," Smith said. "That's a credit to Coach (Kevin) Steele. We just have to find ways to try to exploit it."

Smith said success in the running game will center on the offensive line and the fullbacks making sure the Baylor defenders don't get through those gaps.

Fullback Travis Wilson said that's a challenge for him and the offensive line, a challenge they accept.

"It puts added pressure on both of us because we know they are going to have steady guys in each gap and if they have a guy in each gap, then it's going to be tough to not only hit a guy but move a guy out of that gap," he said.

Coach Bill Snyder said the impressiveness of the Baylor defense is sometimes

Kicking game needs improvement

By Ben Fehr
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State has struggled with kicking extra points and field goals all season.

The Wildcats rank last in the Big 12 in PAT kicking, and eighth in field goal kicking.

And with the game on the line last Saturday against Texas, K-State's struggles in the kicking game finally cost them everything.

With seven seconds left to go, Jared Brite had a field goal blocked. Had the try gone in, K-State would have had a chance to win in overtime.

Coach Snyder said the problem has to be dealt with immediately.

"You have to roll your sleeves up, go to work, and find a way to make it happen," Snyder said. "That's what I have to do. Will there be changes? That's quite possible. I don't know yet."

Snyder said the problems are taking place because of the entire PAT and field goal units.

"It's collective," he said. "We have to kick the ball better, and we have to protect better. Both are issues. And one can draw attention to the other very easily. When one falters, the other one is probably going to falter a little bit, too. Or very easily could."

Brite said the kickers understand what needs to take place.

"I'd like to come back and get everything back on the right track," Brite said. "We need to get our PATs and field goals through and just take things one step at a time."

"I really don't feel like there's any more or less pressure. Things have been the same. We know what we have to do. We have to get the kicking unit better."

In K-State's last two games, the Wildcats have had six PATs blocked.

And the lone field goal try against Texas was blocked as well.

Like the Wildcats, other teams have struggled to have success kicking the ball, mostly when Lavar Arrington, currently with the Redskins, was with Penn State.

Trip to Colorado 1st of 6 tough road matches to end season

6-match streak instills confidence for Colorado game

By Sean Purcell
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State's conference season is half over, and the Wildcats sit in a tie for second place in the Big 12.

But now the Cats (12-6, 8-2) face the final half of the season, one that has six tough road matches on it, Coach Suzie Fritz said.

The volleyball team will go to Colorado this weekend, then to Texas Tech, Missouri, Texas A&M, Texas and finally Nebraska to end the regular season.

Fritz said it will be a tough road ahead for the Cats.

"It's like a whole new season," she said.

"The first half is over, and now we start a new season and the way our schedule falls, we have to be good on the road. We've got A&M on the road, we've got Missouri on the road, we've got Colorado on the road, we've got Nebraska on the road so we're going to have to get some significant wins on the road in the second half."

K-State (12-6, 8-2) at Colorado (11-9, 5-5)

When: Saturday 8 p.m.

Where: Coors Event Center (11,076), Boulder, Colo.

But if the second half goes like the first half did, K-State will get a bid to its seventh straight NCAA tournament.

The Cats have won six straight going to this weekend's match with Colorado, a streak that has lasted since the beginning of the month.

Junior outside hitter Cari Jensen said the difference has been due to the team being more composed during tight situations.

She said that at the beginning of the season, they got rattled when a game or match was close.

Now they stay a little more calm, cool and collective, and just focus on getting the job done.

"At the beginning of the year, we weren't a very composed team, so we've talked about getting better at that, staying composed in tight situations," Jensen said. "I think we are getting a lot better at that."

Cari and her sister Kris, are natives of Colorado.

Cari said she looks forward to this match because it's really the only opportunity she and Kris have to see family and friends.

"It's a home match for us, literally," Cari said.

"In high school we had a great following of people. State up there is in Denver and our whole town came up and watched us, so it will be a lot like that."

Perhaps that will be an advantage for the Cats, as Boulder is one of the tougher places to play in the conference, Fritz said.

But the team is in a good position, she said. Not only

Distinguished Lecture Series features Clinton aide

Speech focuses on influence of politics on scientific studies, new technology

By Amy Link
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students filled the Hemisphere room in Hale Library in order to hear Neil Lane speak Thursday.

Lane was assistant to President Clinton for science and technology from 1998-2001. He now is a professor at Rice University.

His speech, "Science in the White House — and Around the Town," focused on the relationship between politics and science.

Dean Zollman, head of the Department of Physics, said Lane came to K-State as part of the University Distinguished Lecture Series.

Zollman said he had met Lane before and that Lane was a friend to several people in the physics department.

Zollman said Lane was brought to K-State to educate students on a variety of issues.

"Students would be interested in how the government works, what Lane did, the influence of politics on science, and how the president must rely on people," Zollman said.

Lane said he was teaching at Rice University when he received a call from the White House.

He was told that, given Senate approval, he would be the director of the National Science Foundation. Lane was appointed in 1993 and began the task of overseeing an agency with a budget of $5 billion.

Lane used his experiences to explain how politics and science work together. He listed four points he learned during his time as director of the foundation.

First was how government policy and human technology depend on science, and how much people value science.

"Eighty-one percent of American people believe funding for science is needed even if it brings no immediate results," Lane said.

Lane also said science and technology change faster than government policies can, and that some branches of science become more advanced and complex, which can be difficult for government officials to fully comprehend.

Lane said this hinders policy making.

Public policy on environment, energy, health and defense is based on political environment, Lane said.

He said he noticed a change in the operation of the foundation when the Republicans became the majority in 1994. Lane was told to lay low on promoting changes in policy, which, he said he did to a certain degree.

Lane noted other changes as well.

"All the people with big offices suddenly had the small ones in the basement," he said.

He quoted Will Rogers when discussing the issue of partisan politics.

"I would have to agree with Will Rogers when he said 'I am not a member of an organized political party. I'm a democrat,'" Lane said.

Lane said Rogers had a good statement when he said "I have never met a man I didn't like," and that America's acceptance of different people and ideas is what makes it truly unique.

Lane said he hopes the country doesn't lose that quality.

Jessica Lutz, junior in agricultural communications, said she enjoyed Lane's speech both for his jokes and his insights into the political world.

"It was neat for K-State to get someone who has a first-hand account of the workings of Washington," Lutz said.

SNIPER | 2 suspects arrested in New Jersey sniper development

One source, speaking on condition of anonymity, said a gun found in the suspects' car appeared to use .223-caliber bullets — the fatal calling card in the attacks that began Oct. 2 with the killing of James D. Martin in a grocery store parking lot in Wheaton, Md.

Police also found a scope and tripod in the car, the official said.

Two senior federal law enforcement officials, speaking on condition of anonymity, said investigators hadn't ruled out other accomplices, including some who may have provided vehicles or support.

The suspects, it seems, might have been tripped up by their own arrogance; authorities said they received a call on the task force tip line taking responsibility for the sniper attacks and for something in "Montgomery."

Evidence from a Sept. 21 liquor store heist in Montgomery, Ala., which killed one employee and wounded another, then led police to Malvo and Muhammad.

But who were these two, and why might they have unleashed terror on Maryland, Virginia and the District of Columbia?

Muhammad, a veteran of the Gulf War, converted to Islam, according to The Seattle Times. Malvo is a citizen of Jamaica. The Times quoted federal sources as saying the two had been known to speak sympathetically about the hijackers who attacked the World Trade Center and the Pentagon.

But there was no indication, authorities said, that they were linked to al-Qaeda or any terrorist group.

The two were arrested without incident by members of the sniper task force at a rest stop in Frederick County, 50 miles northwest of Washington. The time was 3:19 a.m.

Three hours earlier, Montgomery County Police Chief Charles Moose had announced that Muhammad and Malvo were being sought and issued a nationwide alert for a blue, 1990 Chevrolet Caprice with New Jersey plates. A motorist and an attendant spotted the car and called police.

The Caprice has an opening in its trunk that would permit someone to lie inside and fire the rifle while remaining hidden, two federal law enforcement sources told The Associated Press.

Muhammad did not receive sniper training during his Army career, but he did receive a Marksmanship Badge with expert rating — the highest of three ratings — in use of the M-16 rifle, according to Army records.

A senior defense official who disclosed parts of Muhammad's Army record said Muhammad had training in three areas, mainly as a combat engineer.

He also was trained as a metal worker and a water transport specialist.

His highest ranking on active duty was sergeant.

KICKERS | Team lacking proper technical approach

Arrington was so adept at blocking field goals and PAT's that an opposing coach came up with the idea of having his kickers kick over ladders in preparation.

K-State hasn't employed that method just yet.

Brite said the kickers have a routine meant to hit the ball so it clears the line and added that the main problem lies in an improper technical approach.

"We don't bring a ladder out, but we take a box about three feet tall and put it real close in front of us," he said. "If you get it up over those first 3-feet then it's going to be high enough to get over the line."

"A lot of it is technique. A lot of times my plant foot will go too far past the ball, which will result in a low kick. There's stuff I just have to watch the film on and get better in practice."

Snyder said the K-State coaches are approaching the problem as a fixable one.

"I'm not going to send anybody to sit on the couch for two hours to go through this," he said. "It's a mechanical thing that has to get worked out. It's getting the fundamentals correct, and if you do that, you'll get the ball of the ground."

Brite also believes the problem is fixable.

After the meltdown at the conclusion of the Texas game, Brite showered, put on a tie, and faced the media about his inability to execute properly when the game was on the line.

Brite said he will hold himself accountable for the problems in K-State's kicking game no matter what the situation is.

"If I'd have done good I would have been in there," Brite said.

"So after I'd done bad, I felt like I needed to be in there. Just because I didn't execute what I needed to do on the last play of the game doesn't mean I need to be, more or less, a coward."

"It's easy not to show up. Especially when they give you all the excuses in the world not to show up. You need to do it though. We always complain we don't like the fair-weather fans, so who wants a fair-weather athlete?"

BAYLOR | Cats must limit big plays against Bears

overshadowed by an unproductive Bear offense. The Baylor quarterbacks have already thrown 15 interceptions this season.

Against Colorado last weekend, the Bears turnovers led to two Colorado scores.

"They are a good defensive football team," Snyder said. "Sometimes the number of points scored against them would make that seem a little different."

The Bears have also been shut out in consecutive weeks, and are struggling just trying to find people to play — as four players are out for the season because of injuries.

The quarterback having the most success against the Buffs was Josh Zachary. He hasn't started a game for Baylor yet this season, but linebacker Josh Buhl said they will be ready for whoever Baylor starts.

The other quarterback who will probably see action is Greg Cicero.

Snyder said he knows what Cicero is capable of, as he visited the K-State camp over the summer. He said both quarterbacks possess ability.

"I've always believed (Cicero) was a very adept quarterback, but also the have the youngster Zachary," Snyder said. "Now if Karas can't go I don't know who it will be — but Zachary came in the game last week against Colorado and threw well above 60 percent. So without having the preparation time the others had over the week he did quite well."

But as with any team, Baylor or Texas, it's about not giving up the big play, Buhl said.

Last weekend, Texas was able to score on one big play and get in position to score by way of another big play.

"I think we have seen what the mistakes are and we see that we can't give up the big play on defense," Buhl said. "We always talk about getting better in everything but we have to make sure we don't give up those big plays."

As the Cats look to bounce back once again, they can't overlook Baylor, Wilson said.

The team's goals might have changed, he said, but they now have a goal to win the final five games and see where they sit at the end of the season.

"Any game after is a loss is going to be very tough to see how you bounce back, no matter if a national championship team or Baylor," Wilson said. "Any team you have to play after a loss is going to show your character so we will have to play well against these guys."

PARKING | Students find parking spots on streets

session there is a constant struggle for parking spaces."

However, Schoen said that many times there is a misconception of parking.

"Many times, residents call in and complain about the number of cars in front of their house, thinking it's illegal," he said.

"But we're not necessarily upset with that. We're concerned with if they're parked legally."

Parking is considered illegal on streets such as Ratone or Vattier if the vehicle is parked between the hours of 2 a.m. and 9 a.m. without a permit in a marked green zone. Only those vehicles with issued green permits are allowed to park on these streets during those hours.

In addition, no vehicles are allowed in or around resident driveways without permission.

Although parking signs with specific information are posted throughout Manhattan's city streets, Schoen says his patrol officers issue tickets regularly.

"We issue a number of tickets on a daily basis," he said. "We do quite a number of parking citations each day."

Even though Cyle Kitchen, junior in psychology, knows of the number of tickets issued on the side streets, he continues to park there for convenience.

"I would rather walk a couple of blocks than pay $75 for a parking permit," he said. "I live two miles away, so I'm not going to walk from my house. I park on the side streets because I'd rather walk the two or three blocks."

Even Fisher, who has not had a large problem with illegal parking in front of her house, feels that parking on the side streets saves time and money.

"I can't blame them," she said.

"It's so much cheaper than buying a parking permit. You can't find a parking spot anywhere around campus anyway, so it's just easier to park and walk."

have they won six straight, but they are starting the play the kind of volleyball Fritz said they are capable of playing.

And they hope they will play even better as they start the home stretch of the 2002 season.

"We're not done yet," Fritz said. "This team is going to get better - this team has to get better, because we have to be able to play on the road."

"You've got to be maybe a little better on the road than you are at home in this conference because anybody could get you. It's one of the best conferences in the country, so I'm pretty happy with where we are at right now."

Online love comes easier for some

Internet couples find comfort, intimacy through computer

By Tina Deines
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Finding a spouse could be as easy as the click of a mouse.

With thousands of chat rooms and hundreds of dating services on the Internet, many people are finding online interaction to be the easiest way to initiate relationships.

Steve Hart, 1999 K-State graduate, said he met his wife, Angie, 2001 University of Kansas graduate, online.

Both Steve and Angie said an advantage of an online relationship is being in the comfort of one's own home.

Steve said he was tired of hitting the bar scene looking for prospective dates.

"I was just kind of tired of going out all the time and trying to meet someone," Steve said.

For Angie, it was a matter of ease.

"It's convenience," she said. "You don't have to leave the house."

She also said Web dating is especially beneficial for college students.

"It's really convenient if you're a student or if you are busy," she said. "You can fit it into your schedule whenever."

Dan Wilcox, psychologist at University Counseling Services, said online relationships may be advantageous because they create time and space between people, which may help them invest more time in communicating with each other.

"It could encourage people to talk," he said. "That's something a lot of relationships miss."

Another advantage to this type of union, according to an article by Andre Cross at www.askmen.com, is having a catalog of people to search. A person can look at people with all types of physical characteristics and personalities.

Cross also noted that online dating is cheaper than a date and is easier for shy people.

Although Wilcox said many positives can come from this form of communication, he warned that there might be negative results as well.

He said students complain about the lack of honesty in online relationships.

"I guess the temptation that some people have to be dishonest is something that can really affect the course of an Internet relationship," Wilcox said.

He said once trust is broken within any relationship, it is hard to repair.

"Relationships are difficult enough, but to deal with dishonesty on the Internet must be really hard," Wilcox said.

Wilcox said if people choose to engage in Internet relationships, they need to make sure they also have plenty of face-to-face interaction. Otherwise, people might become withdrawn and unable to develop bonds with others without the support of their computer.

"I think, for some people with online dating, this has become their exclusive mode of interacting with people, and it excludes them," Wilcox said.

He said, though, that the success of online dating mostly depends on the way the two people choose to utilize it.

"It's just you and that person," he said. "If people take advantage of that, that's the key."

FBI warns of possible terrorist attacks against American transportation systems

By Leslie Miller
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — The FBI issued a warning to state and local law enforcement nationwide Thursday about a possible attack soon against transportation systems, particularly railroads.

Officials said the warning, based on information obtained from al-Qaeda prisoners, suggested that terrorists may try to take out bridges, key sections of tracks or train engines in an effort to cause derailments and widespread damage.

"Information from debriefings of al-Qaeda detainees as of mid-October indicates that the group has considered directly targeting U.S. passenger trains, possibly using operatives who have a Western appearance," the FBI said in a statement.

Intelligence officials continue to believe that al-Qaeda plans to attack targets that would be readily recognized as representing U.S. economic interests, the FBI said.

graphs of U.S. railroad engines, cars and crossings have increased concern about the threat, the FBI said.

Amtrak President David Gunn said federal transportation officials notified him about the warning. "The threat, like a lot of others, is not specific," Gunn said. "It's not targeted at anything per se."

Gunn said the passenger railroad is taking steps to enhance security and passenger safety, but declined to describe them except to say they will not be evident to riders.

Amtrak has increased patrols and freight railroads have tightened security, the FBI said.

Around the Sept. 11 anniversary, Amtrak announced it intended to enforce tighter identification requirements, including ID checks of passengers on trains. But Amtrak decided to reconsider that plan and has never implemented it.

The Office of Homeland Security was contacting key state and local officials to urge their help and vigilance in warding off any such attack, spokesman Gordon Johndroe said.

"The American people should still ride our nation's rails and know that this warning has been provided to state and local law enforcement, and the appropriate security officials, so they can take the appropriate steps to increase protective measures," Johndroe said.

New York Gov. George Pataki said, "There are threats and those out there who are looking to do us harm here in the United States."

He said Ridge did not identify any specific target in New York. Even so, Pataki said, New York has "put out an advisory across the state to make sure that the public is vigilant and we are vigilant in protecting public services and infrastructure points across this state."

Separately, U.S. intelligence has learned that al-Qaeda supporters may be planning strikes on ships in the Persian Gulf and nearby seas, said one official, speaking on the condition of anonymity.

SALINA | Staff morale decreases with budget cuts

are needed," Kuhlman said. "We have been able to schedule available classes to the maximum number of students who need it. This enables us to offer one less section a lot of times, which, of course, saves us money without sacrificing student needs."

Lynsey Burnett, student body president at K-State-Salina, said that even though the changes were drastic, they didn't affect students' education as much as some expected.

"Before the cuts, we tried to make sure everyone was aware of the possibility, so they weren't broadsided by it," she said, "but it really isn't that noticeable. The college still has a great commitment to education."

Security upgrades

Another unexpected demand on the budget was the need for immediate security upgrades because of the Sept. 11 attacks, Kuhlman said.

"The attacks put additional pressure on us to move ahead a little faster on the security programs," he said. "We had planned to complete it in a couple of years, but instead, we had to take that step immediately."

Those upgrades — meeting security guidelines from Federal Aviation Administration, the FBI, CIA and the Salina Regional Airport — forced the college to shift funding to cover the expenses.

"This is money that could have gone towards equipment upgrades or hiring faculty," he said. "But it is also something that is completely out of our control."

Current situation

As expected, Kuhlman said, staff morale within the college is down, but it mostly centers on the uncertainty. None of the faculty or classified staff received pay increases.

"They see all the ways we have cut already and are now asking what happens at the end of this year and the year after that," he said. "There is fear that the budget is starting to infringe on the real reason we are here — education."

Kuhlman said that even though it is hard to keep the two issues — budget and education — separate, he is trying to focus on the positive effects of the reductions.

"I want to think of this as a short-term process," he said. "It will eventually turn around, and I want us to be in the position we need to be in to pursue excellence in education."

To do that, Kuhlman said he is engaging faculty in discussions about the principles that will guide them if there is another budget cut.

"We are aware of the potential of additional cuts," he said. "While we don't have an exact number amount picked out, we are looking at methods to decrease spending. But first, we must decide what principles are important to us, and it should be education."

He also is informing students of the long-range goals of the college.

"I think, for the most part, the students feel safe despite the potential for additional budget cuts," Burnett said. "The dean has presented the long-range plan, and we have a picture of what is going to change."

And while Kuhlman expects these changes to be permanent, he does think it will help the college move toward excellence in education.

"We are still offering a quality education with less money," he said.

"While this is not ideal, we are doing it. When the money does start coming back in, we will be able to use it in efficient ways because we know what works."

VET MED | College cuts budget by $1.3 million

The college also set aside about $382,000 in reserves in anticipation for more budget cuts.

Then, in August, when Gov. Bill Graves ordered $41 million in emergency cuts, K-State was forced to cut again. This time, Veterinary Medicine's bill was an additional $84,000.

"If we have another million-dollar shortfall from the state, our reserves are gone," Richardson said.

The college also froze five teaching positions, saving about $508,000, Richardson said.

"We can't cut classes because we have a very structured curriculum," he said. "So, the open positions put additional pressure on our existing staff."

The cuts also were passed on to the individual departments, costing the college about $471,000, Richardson said.

Those two factors, plus tuition increases helped, Richardson said, but certainly didn't solve the problem.

"There are serious concerns in the college," he said.

"We will avoid personnel layoffs at all cost — that needs to be known — but employees are still concerned. There is not despair or desperation, but it is definitely on people's minds."

Richardson said the cuts are permanent — for now.

"You can never say never," he said, "but I know it will be years before any areas are restored. Once the economy has a turn-around, we can start to rebuild a new base. Until then, we have to deal with this."

Volunteers Will Hold Clean-Up and Barbeque

The idea started small, as a way to give back to the community, but Kari Baldonado started what will hopefully become a yearly tradition.

This Saturday, October 26th, Tri-Delta is hosting an event consisting of community service and a barbeque with their neighbors and K-State greeks. Tri-Delta hosted their neighborhood's first Neighborhood Watch meeting of the semester, and received positive feedback on the idea from their neighbors. They solicited projects for Saturday ranging from cleaning out gutters and repotting plants to generally cleaning of the neighborhood.

After helping the neighborhood, there will be a block party barbeque for neighbors and the greek volunteers in the 1800th block of Fairchild.

"I just thought it would be a good way to improve relations with the people who live around us," said Kari. "A lot of us have lived in this neighborhood for two or three years and don't know any of the neighbors." People are still welcome to volunteer this Saturday. The community service will run from 11:00 am to 1:00 pm, so come to Tri-Delta before noon to check in!

Bring In the Greeks

The B.I.G. Event is November 22nd, and will be an entire day of KSU greeks helping various organizations in the community. Encourage members of your chapter to volunteer to benefit Manhattan and thank the community for all of their support!

The greek community would like to congratulate the students of K-State for their involvement in Up 'Til Dawn! K-State has 93 teams, the largest number of volunteers ever across the country!

Greek of the Month

On behalf of the entire Kansas State University Greek community, we would like to congratulate Sarah Voos for being October's Greek of the Month recipient! Sarah is a junior member of Alpha Delta Pi sorority and is majoring in Secondary Education with a 3.328 GPA. She currently serves as the chapter's New Member Coordinator. She has been working very hard to prepare all of the new members for their upcoming initiation by teaching them about the history of the sorority and about the responsibility they hold for carrying the sorority into the future. Through that position, Sarah is also a member of the executive board and works with the chapter advisor and other officers to make sure things run smoothly. She works with the national headquarters of Alpha Delta Pi to prepare for initiation.

Outside of her sorority, Sarah is the Membership Chair for Greeks Advocating the Mature Management of Alcohol (GAMMA). She has worked very hard to improve this organization and get its message across to the entire campus. She has assisted in planning "Alcohol Awareness Week," which teaches greeks and non-affiliated individuals to be better educated on the effects of alcohol on college campuses. Sarah has made an effort recently to visit every single sorority and fraternity to make sure that they continue to send chapter representatives to each GAMMA meeting.

In addition to being this month's Greek of the Month, Sarah has been accepted for membership into Kappa Delta Pi, an education honor society. She was also recently nominated for the Delta Chi fraternity's Sorority Woman of the Year award. After college, Sarah hopes to someday prepare future generations by becoming a teacher. She would like to be able to teach either middle school or high school social studies.

Outside of all of her activities, Sarah is a big participant in the Kansas State University Intramural program. Sports are definitely a passion of hers. She also says that she enjoys getting to know new people every chance that she gets. She believes in working hard, which leads her to put her heart into everything she does. She strongly believes in doing everything to the best of her abilities and to always ask for help whenever she needs it.

Once again, we would like to congratulate Sarah Voos from Alpha Delta Pi on being October's Greek of the Month. Sarah is a very qualified, nice individual and she is definitely an asset both to the Greek community and to the student body of Kansas State University as a whole. Great job!

Office staff adapts

Staff members face challenges of dealing with cuts

By Amy Preston
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

University budget cuts have made a significant impact on K-State's nine colleges, and secretaries and office employees have seen a different side of the story.

Leslye Haller, senior administrative assistant with the agronomy research extension program, said state budget cuts have affected the way she deals with purchases and bills in her office.

"I have to be very careful to balance and pay the bills and double-check things a lot closer," she said.

According to Haller, the agronomy extension program at one time had an $87,000 operating budget. Months later, the budget had been significantly slashed.

"I don't even think we know what our exact number is, but the way I look at it is we might as well be at zero," she said.

John Struve, vice president of administration and finance, said the financial office assigns a specific amount of money to each college from an equal-percentage basis. In turn, the college is responsible for that money's distribution.

"A college receives a specific

Teen arrested at roadblock after shooting spree

By Nick Trougakos

SALLISAW, Okla. — A teenager, apparently upset by complaints about his driving, shot four neighbors, including a 2-year-old girl, then went on a 20-mile shooting spree, apparently targeting people at random, police said. Two of the victims died.

Daniel Fears, 18, was arrested after losing control of his pickup truck and crashing near a police roadblock, authorities said. As police cars surrounded him, he threw out a rifle and surrendered, said Oklahoma State Bureau of Investigation spokeswoman Kym Koch.

Authorities hadn't determined a motive for the Saturday rampage, but police said they believed Fears became angry when a neighbor scolded him for driving recklessly in the middle-class neighborhood.

"A man got onto him for driving erratically because he said he almost hit some kids," Koch said.

Some people in Sallisaw wondered if Fears was mimicking the sniper attacks in the Washington area.

"I think it's a copycat thing," said Camellia Conley, an employee at a Sallisaw hotel. "He's been a rebel without a cause. He was always a loner and always wore a black trench Animals were loose Sunday at Sunset Zoological Park.

Frogs, bumble bees and blue dogs trekked from cage to cage in search of one thing — candy, and lots of it.

"I am a froggy," Brandon Sleva, 2, said. "I got lots of candy today."

From 1 to 7 p.m. Saturday and noon to 4 p.m. Sunday, parents and children braved the cold for an early start on trick-or-treating at Sunset Zoo's annual Spooktacular event.

Joining the brave, members of K-State's Pre-Veterinary Medicine Club cuddled together on hay bales.

"We are die-hard Halloween fans," said Jenn Boland, junior in pre-veterinary medicine who was dressed as an "'80s girl" for the day. "We raided our closet, and here we are."

High school bands participate in festival at KSU stadium

Kansas students gain experience, improve

By Karl Kennedy
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Even with the football team away this Saturday, KSU Stadium still had a crowd.

In the stands were people covered in blankets and holding hot chocolate. They were there to watch high school marching bands from all over the state play in the K-State Central States Marching Band Festival.

"The main purpose for this festival is to bring high school bands to the campus, to watch and evaluate their performance and help to make them better," Frank Tracz, director of K-State bands, said.

Bands performed from 1 p.m. until the performance of the K-State Marching Band at 7 p.m. Judges from Florida, Iowa and the Kansas City area evaluated the bands by how they played, marched and performed other basics that go with being in a marching band, Tracz said.

"We don't declare a winner since it's a festival," he said. "The judges rate them one — superior, to five — poor."

After the bands performed, they had a chance to watch a

Questionable

The U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission concluded in May that Costco Wholesale Corp.'s firing of Kimberly Cloutier for refusing to stop wearing an eyebrow ring at work constituted religious discrimination in that Cloutier is a member of the Oregon-based Church of Body Modification. The church says piercings and tattoos "are essential to our spiritual salvation." Based on the EEOC ruling, Cloutier, 27, of West Springfield, Mass., filed a federal lawsuit against Costco for not "accommodating" her religious practice, as required by law.

Police in Modesto, Calif., arrested Kelli Pratt, 45, in October and charged her with domestic abuse after she, enraged by her husband's refusal to have sex, allegedly held him down and bit him so viciously and so many times that his severely ripped-open skin was ripe for the bacterial infection that killed him six days later. Kelli suffers from multiple sclerosis and often uses a wheelchair. Husband Arthur, 65, had recently been hospitalized for diabetes. Said an arresting officer, "(Kelli) refused to wash up (before we videotaped her), so she basically looks (on the tape) like a vampire with blood all over her face and teeth."

Greeks donate time, effort to help neighbors

Community service provides opportunities to meet Manhattan residents

By James Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Mary Page loves her house, but now she has to sell it.

Page and her husband, Roy, have lived at 1821 Laramie St. for 33 years, and Mary said it has been a wonderful home. Their children could walk to Eugene Field Elementary School, and Roy could walk to his job at the Department of History on campus.

"Our lives have been here," Mary said.

"Every piece of this house has a story. But it's served its time. I'm in a different stage of my life now."

Less than two weeks ago, Mary and Roy moved to Meadowlark Hills Retirement Community, primarily because of Roy's severe case of Parkinson's disease, Mary said.

In preparing to sell the house, Mary said there was just too much for her to do by herself.

She cleaned out most of her husband's books, many of which were donated to Hale Library, and most of the inside of the house was ready.

However, the garage needed cleaning, and the leaves needed to be raked.

Then the neighbors pitched in.

Several greek houses, many within a block of the Page residence, spent part of Saturday doing community service for their neighbors.

"I'm delighted," Page said. "It meets a need for me right now."

The community service activity, organized by the Delta Delta Delta sorority, brought together members of greek houses, including Theta Xi, Kappa Kappa Gamma, Lambda Chi Alpha and Pi Kappa Phi, in an effort to meet neighbors and establish good relations with them, said Kari Baldonado, junior in public relations and public relations officer for Tri-Delt.

Nathan Geiger, senior in animal science and business and member of Theta Xi fraternity, helped rake leaves in Page's yard. He said he was pleased to be able to help with the effort.

"It's a good way for the houses to get in good with the neighbors," he said. "They're permanent residents, so we don't want to make them mad."

For some, the day was a chance to return favors.

"You shouldn't just live some place for a while and not get to know your neighbors," said Jim Hodgson, junior in agronomy and member of Theta Xi.

Drew Rose | COLLEGIAN

Ben Reed, senior in political science and member of Theta Xi fraternity, uses a leaf blower to clean a lawn on Laramie Street. Several greek houses spent Saturday morning cleaning up the neighborhood.

"Tim (Lindemuth) keeps an eye on the house in the summer, so it's good to be able to help him out."

Hodgson was raking leaves in Lindemuth's garden, across the street from Theta Xi. Lindemuth said the community service showed the students' appreciation of living in a neighborhood with so many K-State faculty and staff.

"It multiplies the effort," said Lindemuth, employee of the K-State Alumni Association.

"I live alone, so it's too much work for me. But their help kind of motivates me to get something done."

Karlee Stark and her husband both are former K-State employees. She said she enjoyed having the students help with some of the yard work.

Many times, she said, there are beer bottles and cans in their yard, and her husband's knee problems often limit the amount of yard work he can do.

"They're wonderful," she said, "and very willing workers."

Stark said she gave Baldonado, who coordinated the community service project, a list of possible jobs for the students to do, and they showed up and completed the jobs quickly.

Because of a turnout that was higher than expected, the workers quickly ran out of things to do.

Most students raked yards or cleaned gutters, but others helped rearrange garages or haul trash to the dump. Neighbors were invited to a barbecue following the community service activities.

Overall, the day was a success, said Kevin Jones, junior in finance and member of Pi Kappa Phi fraternity.

"It did a lot to break the stereotypes of the greek community," he said.

"I don't know all of them because I'm a greek myself, but I think there's definitely a negative connotation."

"It's important for the community to understand that we're not just worried about ourselves. We want to give back, too."

number of money, and then the dean will determine what will be done with it," he said. "We don't say to cut down on paper or cut down on supplies. Our philosophy is that those decisions are made closer to the actual expenditure."

However, Struve said the financial office has prepared the colleges for the future.

"We did tell them when they got their budget allocations in May and June to plan on an additional 4-percent budget reduction for this fiscal year," he said.

"We did not take that money back, but we told them to be prepared."

Struve said this philosophy has been successful for both parties involved.

"We're comfortable with that, and for the most part, other deans are comfortable," he said.

In the agronomy extension program, Haller said the department head has been looking for solutions to the ongoing problem.

"Our operating budget took a nasty cut," she said. "Our department head has been doing good digging up alternatives so we can operate."

With their budget, agronomy extension program officials divided their money among the 10 specialists within the department.

"They get an allotted amount of money for office supplies, gasoline and travel expenses," Haller said.

Budget cuts

The Collegian is exploring the effects of budget cuts made by the Kansas Legislature by analyzing each of K-State's nine colleges, along with services that affect students. With mid-year cuts that could be detrimental to the university, higher-education funding has become a top issue in November's elections.

"Once that's gone, it's gone."

Therefore, Haller said, the office has had to cut back on office supplies and approve any large purchases before making orders.

In addition, the extension program has taken time to plan for any future budget cuts.

"I know they've had lots of meetings with the department head, and they're planning well into next year, even though they don't know what next year holds," Haller said.

The Office of Extensive Human Nutrition has not been affected as much by the numerous budget cuts.

"It hasn't affected my department too much, mostly because we have made other arrangements through grants," said Michelle Burkland, office specialist for the extensive human nutrition program.

"The only thing that is affecting us is the publication we do."

The publication of "The Nutrition Spotlight" was reduced from six times a year to four times a year.

"It cost about $3,500 a year to publish, and then mail was on top of that," Burkland said. "That's a lot of money for a publication, so we thought we could save a little bit there by cutting down."

Another area of reduction included the paper supply throughout the office. Burkland said the human nutrition offices have turned to the Internet to post newsletters and handouts to save paper.

"It's not any harder to do. It's just an extra step mostly because some of the people don't always have the technology to get something that's attached to an e-mail," she said. "They'll end up calling and saying to send them a copy, which is what we were trying to avoid."

In the future, Burkland said the extensive nutrition program might have to raise the costs of informational videos and CDs made by the department.

"We don't make a profit on it, but it may be more expensive to mail it," she said. "In years past we have been able to eat money off of a CD and a video, but we may have to raise the price to make up for some of the deficit cost."

As for the agronomy extension program, the future remains uncertain, Haller said.

"It really worries me, mainly because I've been at this job for so many years, and it concerns me," she said. "I'm not really sure how many people totally understand what's going on."

TO THE POINT Local events help bolster Halloween spirit

To get people in the Halloween spirit, several K-State and Manhattan organizations are offering their services.

This past weekend, Sunset Zoological Park sponsored its annual Spooktacular event. Trick-or-treaters and their parents who came to the zoo were able to collect candy, play games and win prizes.

Students and Manhattan residents still can enjoy the Manhattan Jaycee's Haunted House, located at the Green Valley Industrial Park behind Dara's Fast Lane on Highway 24, at 7 p.m. tonight, Wednesday and Thursday.

UPC's Children's Carnival, from 10:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. Wednesday in the Union Courtyard, will have games, prizes, candy and pumpkin decorating.

And Manhattan's "Freak Fest" Thursday evening at the Wareham Opera House on Poyntz Avenue will feature Pomeroy and Steve Ewing, former lead singer of The Urge.

We admire how K-State and Manhattan embrace the holiday. Everyone should take advantage of what businesses and organizations have to offer.

Keep reading the Collegian for upcoming holiday coverage and to find out more about the activities you can participate in on Halloween.

People should experience many cultures

Editor's note: Lorena is pursuing a doctoral degree in curriculum and instruction. Every Monday, she will tackle an issue in her native language, Spanish, as well as English. Gloria Freeland, associate professor of journalism, edits the columns. Both columns convey the same message and allow the Collegian to reach a more diverse audience. You can e-mail her at lorena@ksu.edu.

I am pleased to receive numerous reactions to my columns. This is very important in journalistic communication. Life is fact, but we humans have many opinions. Sometimes we are in agreement, sometimes we have different opinions and sometimes we have clearly contradictory opinions. It is through dialogue and discussion that we find the way to understand each other, to cooperate and live together on the planet.

The history of humanity has been a history of migration and constant mobility. We are a very nomadic species. Thank God the planet is spherical, and we can go around it. To be born and raised in a particular territory, surrounded by a specific human group and communicating in a common language is part of the basic human reality, but not the only one. We nomadic humans also have to move to distant territories and be surrounded by different people who use other languages for communication. Obviously, then, some difficulties of adaptation arise.

The question is, if people live forever in their own country with their own people, language and culture, should they reject others who aren't from their country because they weren't born there?

It is natural that a group would not be happy to be host to military invaders, criminals and aggressive enemies who could damage their own people. It is natural that individuals might prefer not to venture into hostile, aggressive and rejecting social groups. This is why migration is a complex social phenomenon to be understood by the social sciences. Social migratory policy cannot be the result of whimsical transitory feelings, pure public opinion or the caprice of the government. Migratory policy is the result of a social need to exchange, to share and to have trade. The visa is nothing but a mechanism to be selective, not to close the door.

The U.S. military invaded my country, Costa Rica, in 1856, and the country fought back. That does not mean that for the rest of history, we have to close our country to visitors from the United States. Mexico was invaded by the U.S. army, and fought a war, but that does not mean that for the rest of Mexican history, citizens of the United States should not be received with open arms in Mexico.

Immigrants relocate, and their choices are not just for their personal convenience but for the host country's convenience as well.

Migration is not and should not be an act of charity. Migration is a national policy. To be united does not mean to be negated and made invisible in our personal and collective diverse identities. The U.S. Civil War was not between white Caucasians and black Africans — it was a war between white U.S. citizens. It was not that the North or the South had to accommodate the others — it was just the need to find a new and better formula for peaceful united coexistence.

When Hitler consecrated the concept of "culture" as the superior racial German culture and decided that all different ones were a danger, a threat and an embarrassment for the German nation, we witnessed his catastrophic crime. Let's be very careful when thinking about the ideas of nation, national culture, aliens and race.

LORENA BARBOZA

Todos debemos conocer varias culturas

Estoy muy complacida de recibir numerosas reacciones sobre mi columna. Eso es muy importante en la comunicación periodística. Ahí está la vida como un hecho, pero los humanos estamos llamados a tener muchas opiniones, algunas veces coincidentes, otras veces diferentes o en clara contradicción. Es a través del diálogo y la discusión que encontramos la forma de entendernos unos a otros, para cooperar y vivir juntos en este planeta.

La historia del ser humano ha sido una de migración y movilidad masiva constante. Somos una especie de nómadas. Gracias a Dios el planeta es esférico, y podemos ir alrededor de él. Nacer y crecer en un territorio específico, rodeados por un grupo particular, comunicándonos en un idioma común, es parte de la realidad básica humana, pero no la única. Nosotros, los nómadas, también tenemos que trasladarnos a territorios distantes y estar rodeados de gente desconocida que usa otro idioma en su comunicación. Obviamente surgen algunas dificultades en ese proceso de adaptación.

La pregunta es: si una persona jamás debe dejar su territorio para permanecer por siempre en su misma tierra, con su cultura e idioma, y si esa sociedad dada debe perdonar la llegada de extranjeros o foráneos, o extraños, o visitantes, cualquiera que sea la palabra designada para quien llega de una nación, una tierra y una cultura diferentes.

Es natural que un grupo no se sienta feliz de ser el anfitrión de invasores militares, criminales o enemigos agresivos dispuestos a dañar a su propia gente. Es natural que los individuos prefieran no aventurarse siendo parte de grupos sociales hostiles, agresivos o rechazados. Por eso la migración es un complejo fenómeno social para ser entendido por las ciencias sociales. La política migratoria no puede ser el resultado de sentimientos transitorios caprichosos, de la pura opinión pública o de la fantasía del gobierno. La política migratoria es el resultado de un intercambio social necesario, para compartir y comerciar. La visa es un mecanismo para seleccionar, no para cerrar puertas.

Costa Rica, mi país, fue invadido en 1856 por combatientes militares estadounidenses, y los obligamos a retirarse. Eso no significa que por el resto de la historia, los costarricenses tengamos que cerrar las puertas a los visitantes de los Estados Unidos. México también fue invadido por el ejército estadounidense, y tuvieron una guerra, pero eso tampoco quiere decir que por el resto de la historia de México, los ciudadanos de USA no puedan ser recibidos en esa nación con los brazos abiertos.

La reubicación de los inmigrantes no solo obedece a su conveniencia personal, sino también a la del país anfitrión. La migración no es ni debe ser un acto de caridad. La migración es una política nacional. Estar unificados no significa ser negados o invisibles en nuestras identidades personales o colectivas. La Guerra Civil Estadounidense no se dio entre caucásicos blancos y africanos negros, esa fue una guerra entre los ciudadanos blancos de los Estados Unidos. No era que el norte o el sur debían acomodar a los demás, era solo la necesidad de encontrar una mejor fórmula para la unión pacífica en convivencia.

Cuando Hitler consagró el concepto de "cultura" refiriéndose a la superioridad de la cultura racial de los alemanes, y decidió que todos los que fueran diferentes eran peligrosos, una amenaza y una lástima para su nación, presenciamos su catastrófico crimen. Seamos muy cuidadosos cuando pensamos en ideas como nación, cultura nacional, extranjeros y raza.

TO THE EDITOR

Donors needed for holiday food drives

Editor,

How blessed we are to live in a community that does such a good job of helping people in need.

In the past, our holiday food drives have successfully met the challenge of providing help for families and children in our community who need assistance.

As a board member for the Flint Hills Breadbasket, I would like to ask our community to rally once again to help fill the holiday food baskets of families in need.

There will be many opportunities for you to contribute and to get involved. One way you can help is to bring cans of nonperishable foods or cash donations to the K-State versus Nebraska football game. K-State students are, once again, having a "Cats for Cans" campuswide food drive and will be collecting your donations at the Nov. 16 football game.

Please open your hearts to those who need a helping hand. Your food or cash donations to the mayor's "Holiday Tree Community Campaign" or to the "Cats for Cans" food drive will ensure a brighter holiday for individuals and families in need.

MEDIOCRE MELODIES

Foo Fighters album lacks depth, appeal

"ONE BY ONE"

Album review by JJ Duncan

Fluctuating between brilliant and boring, "One by One" sees the Foo Fighters manic as ever.

Kicking off with the hard-rocking "All My Life," the track starts off with a simple palm-muted riff with a tension built by Dave Grohl's nearly spoken lyrics before breaking in with loud guitars that lead to a soaring chorus.

It's one of the better Foo Fighters songs ever written, but it unfortunately sets unreasonably high expectations for the rest of the material.

Tracks like the driving "Low" and the melodic "Disenchanted Lullaby" just slow down the album. "One by One" is rife with filler that brings down the album's overall quality. Of course, the Foo Fighters were never good for more than three or four songs per album.

The slow-paced "Tired of You" features a slinking guitar part by Queen's Brian May, but it doesn't save the song — it only makes it slightly more interesting.

Since its debut in 1995, the band has made its reputation by releasing clean studio work that is radio-friendly and edgy in that post-grunge way that still has roots with the Meat Puppets and the Vaselines.

After all, who better to lead a post-grunge alt movement than Nirvana's drummer?

Speaking of which, Grohl is in for some serious cash this Christmas. The release of "One by One" coincidentally corresponds with the Oct. 29 release of Nirvana's greatest hits album.

So where does a post-grunge alt-rock band fit into the 2002 soundscape? Seemingly nowhere.

Lately, if you're a credible rock band, you are either working in garage revival, mainstream Creed-ish stuff, nu metal or indie. Practically the only other bands working in this style with any validity whatsoever are Bush and the Stone Temple Pilots.

The sound has virtually no credibility outside these core bands, a point that has been proven as clones trying to emulate the sound are panned by critics and never quite make it to the mainstream. The thing that keeps these bands around is a loyal fan base.

I hate to invalidate myself, but that means if you like other Foo Fighters albums, you'll like "One by One."

And those loyal fans are in for a few surprises.

The bonus DVD has some cool stuff on video, and the CD gives owners access to an online site where the Foo Fighters will release covers that can't be found anywhere else. This is one way bands and studios try to make it appealing to buy an album instead of downloading it.

Besides, some of this music is sheer excellence. The album was recorded in 13 days to capture the energy of a live performance, Grohl said in an MTV interview. Some of the songs benefit from this energy.

"Halo," "Lonely As You" and the single-worthy "Overdrive" all stand out and are back-to-back-to-back tracks that support the middle of the album very well.

Jackass movie has no place in theaters

Visual presentation, stunts no different than MTV series

"JACKASS"

Movie review by Adam Lee

The poster for "Jackass: the movie" claims it is filled "with stuff you'd never see on TV." Withholding male genitalia and beer consumption, that statement is merely marketing.

Many of the movie's segments already have been used in the series and are carried out in almost identical fashion without further innovation or heightened insanity. The film has little of the psychosis or severity found in Steve-O's "Don't Try This At Home" and "CKY3."

There is an artificial feeling to many of the clips in the movie. Things seem controlled, which is a direct antithesis of what makes the cast's guerrilla-style stunts and pranks so distinctively stimulating.

In one scene, Johnny Knoxville and Bam Margera dress as burglars and come crashing through the ceiling tiles of what appears to be a random office. But the office is just a set with a couple of people who are unaware of the hidden cameras.

In another scene, Chris Pontius attaches an electric muscle stimulator to his scrotum, understandably causing him to writhe in pain.

But Pontius continues to wail and contort at intervals when no one has even flipped the switch. This staged aspect brings into question how much of this is "Jackass" and how much of this is just a movie.

The visual presentation doesn't differ from the show on MTV, and it would probably be impossible to film this stuff on anything other than a Sony HandyCam.

That creates some problems with quality of resolution when projected on the big screen, but they are compensated by some surprisingly beautiful images captured by director Jeff Tremaine. His cinematic opening and closing are the film's greatest feats, but there are some amazing shots sprinkled throughout.

A first-person view of Knoxville being swept away by a simulated tidal wave ends with a close-up on blades of grass, making it feel almost like an art film.

When Steve-O vomits on a full plate of sushi after snorting a line of wasabi, the scene somehow transcends being repulsive and becomes breathtaking.

If you are a discriminating fan of the "Big Brother" and "CKY" videos, you probably, to some degree, have the belief this material has no business in the movie theater. It doesn't.

It's evident watching the film that Paramount Pictures and MTV Films kept Knoxville and his boys on a short leash.

Despite the R rating, the "Jackass" clan is largely unable to bring the filth and the fury of its uncensored pasts to the big screen. But it sure is making a lot of money.

Kansas pop-punk brings sense of humor, short songs

Packing loud guitars, short, tight songs, and a healthy sense of humor that finds their tongues planted firmly in their cheeks, the Primetime Heroes have set out with a sharp pop-punk debut.

For anyone who needed a few more tracks on that last New Found Glory album, the Primetime Heroes are here to save the day. The music measures up to plenty other bigger-named pop-punk acts.

The self-titled album is the work of three Topeka and Lawrence, Kan. veterans, and a newcomer. Former Effigy frontman Rusty Wiley is on guitars and vocals, backed by Brothers From Different Mothers' Colin MacMillan, also on guitar and vocals and Jory Valyer of the Rayguns on drums.

The new guy is Tim Schultz on bass.

One of the older influences that really shines through on this album is the pop-punk predecessor Screeching Weasel. Ben Weasel laid a foundation for the SoCal skater punk that Blink-182 made popular.

These 14 tracks do have their share of highlights. The closing track, "Broken Hearts and Band Analogies" shows a nice bit of studio work with a background piano part and a more sophisticated song structure that leave the listener with the strongest song of the collection.

If nothing else, the Primetime Heroes are a good, fun local band to get behind and support for fans of everything from the Queers and Screeching Weasel to Blink-182.

2nd season of 'American Idol' planned

All of the ingredients that made "American Idol" this summer's television sensation appear to be in place for next year's second installment.

Acid-tongued British record producer Simon Cowell is back as a judge, as are singer-dancer Paula Abdul and industry veteran Randy Jackson. Los Angeles-based radio disc jockey Ryan Seacrest will return as host. Detroit was the first of seven cities where auditions are being held.

Wildcats hope for strong finish

Men's golf team goes to Waco for final fall event

By Tom Fontana
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When the men's golf team tees off today in Waco, Texas, it's looking to end the fall season on a high note.

Last year in the Henry Griffiths/Baylor Intercollegiate, the Cats set a team record with an 855 - 14 strokes better than the previous team three-round score of 869 set in 1999.

This year K-State is ranked No. 19 in the Sagarin rankings, up 29 spots after beating Oklahoma by 32 strokes last week in a dual match at Colbert Hills Golf Course.

Coach Tim Norris said he is pleased with where the team is.

"It's been a good fall so far," he said. "Obviously we'll look back on the fall, and this last tournament will be the most recent memory, so we'd like it to be a good one."

"We've progressed up through the rankings, and this tournament will be another shot to either move up or down," he said. "I'd like to think we have a good chance to move up."

The team also is ranked No. 27 in the GolfStat rankings, but Norris said the rankings will mean a lot more once the team plays in a few more events.

"As the season goes on, the rankings will become a little more valid," he said. "I'd like to think we're No. 19, but I'd like to think we're a little bit better than that. That one match with Oklahoma was weighted a little heavily."

"It's a number, and I think it makes our guys feel good about what they've done so far, and it gives them a chance to go up or down at this next event," Norris said. "We'll look to make this a positive tournament and get some time off and get right back ready to go in the spring."

Much of K-State's success this season can be attributed to junior Aaron Watkins, who is ranked as the No. 12 individual in the country in the Sagarin Rankings.

Watkins has won two events by a combined margin of 15 shots, both home events at Colbert Hills, and leads the team in with a 71.48 stroke average.

"I hate to pin all of our success on one player, but he has really led our team on and off the golf course in a very positive way," Norris said.

"The success he had this summer has really helped him this fall. We're just waiting for some other guys to follow, maybe not step of step with Aaron, but get a little bit closer. I think then, we've really got something."

K-State will send Watkins, A.J. Elgert, Josh Persons, Greg Douglas and Jimmy Dietz to compete in the 15-team field at the Henry Griffiths/Baylor Intercollegiate.

The tournament will be played on a new course, the par-72 Bear Ridge Golf Club. The 7,478-yard course will offer players many of the challenges Colbert Hills offered players earlier this year at the Jim Colbert Intercollegiate.

The field will play 36 holes today, beginning at 8 a.m. with the final round being played Tuesday at 8 a.m.

Norris said this tournament could have all the makings of the Jim Colbert Intercollegiate tournament the Cats were host to just a month ago.

"The scoring will be quite a bit different. It's a lot like Colbert Hills in that par really has some meaning," Norris said.

"Last year's course was short for today's standards, especially for the standard the college players play at," he said. "The scoring record is nice to have, but I think I'm more comfortable going to a course that's a little tougher and that the scoring will be a little higher."

Cats content with sloppy win over hapless Bears

By Sean Purcell
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

WACO, TEXAS - For most people, K-State's game with Baylor on Saturday was supposed to be merely a bump in the road.

And by the end of the 44-10 rout, it was.

But in the eyes of Wildcat players and coaches, Saturday's win was maybe more of a step in the wrong direction because of the lack of consistency.

"We didn't play like I think we are capable of playing in a lot of different areas," Coach Bill Snyder said. "We kind of just hung around for a while and eventually made a play here and there."

One of those plays came in the second quarter, when defensive back Jesse Tetuan intercepted a Josh Zachry pass and returned it 34 yards for the score.

Kicker Joe Rheem tacked on the extra point - K-State's first since Oct. 12 against Oklahoma State - to make the score 10-3.

Couple that with a pair of Rheem field goals, the team's first since Oct. 5 against Colorado, and the Cats entered the locker room up 13-3.

Rheem said there was both relief and disgust with making that first field goal and PAT.

"It was a big relief - we are all capable of doing that," he said. "But at the same time, I was upset because of the way the ball went through the up-rights."

Rheem was perfect on extra points (5-5) and field goals (3-3) on the day, the first time K-State (6-2, 2-2) had done that since the Colorado contest.

But everything wasn't like the Colorado game. K-State's offense wasn't scoring touchdowns.

It didn't do so until the third quarter.

Most of that was due in part to the ineffectiveness of the passing attack, offensive coordinator Ron Hudson said.

Quarterback Ell Roberson was just seven for 17 on the afternoon, throwing for a measly 54 yards.

A majority of Roberson's incompletions were low, or skipped throws - something

Statistics raise questions about KSU defense

By Sean Purcell
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

WACO, Texas - Even in victory, some battles aren't won.

K-State's lost battle might have once again been in the secondary.

Baylor passed for 338 yards Saturday, the most by any team against the Cats all season.

And although the Bears scored just one touchdown, defensive back Terence Newman said the performance was still tough to swallow.

"Giving up 300 and whatever passing yards, that really hurts," he said. "Being a secondary player, that really hurts."

The first play from scrimmage for Baylor might have been an indication the passing game would be effective Saturday.

Quarterback Josh Zachry hooked up with Reggie Newhouse for 20 yards, as defensive back Jesse Tetuan fell on the play.

Coach Bill Snyder said it was hard to Wildcat defensive end Andrew Shull sacks Baylor quarterback Josh Zachry for a 3-yard loss in the second quarter. Shull ended the game with four sacks to cause a total loss of 24 yards for the Bears. The Wildcats tied their record, set in 2000 against Kansas, for most sacks in a game with nine.

Volleyball sweeps CU in Boulder, extends win streak to 8

By Michael Watson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State hit Colorado where it hurt the most.

The Buffaloes are a very physical team, but Coach Suzie Fritz said they do not have a strong left side.

So that's exactly where the Cats put the ball in Saturday's three-game sweep against Colorado (30-22, 30-19, 33-31) at the Coors Events Center in Boulder, Colo.

"We served very well, so that helped take their hitting out of the equation," Fritz said.

"We forced the ball to their left side on our serves, because they are not a left-side dominated team, so that's not how they wanted to win points."

Game 1: K-State 30, CU 22

Game 2: K-State 30, CU 19

Game 3: K-State 33, CU 31

The Wildcats also hit a season-best .338 hitting percentage.

Junior middle blocker Lauren Goehring tied her career-high for the second time this season with 19 kills on her season-best .515 hitting percentage. She now has hit more than .300 in 11 matches this season, including seven times with hitting percentages more than .400.

Against Colorado, Goehring said she connected better with sophomore setter Gabby Guerre.

But she said she isn't the only hitter firing on all cylinders.

Goehring said K-State had three or four hitters consistently attacking the ball, and that meant Colorado had to consider multiple hitting threats.

"Cari Jensen has gotten so hot, and (Jennifer) Pollard is hitting well, too," she said. "So the blocks are spreading out. They're really making me look good."

Junior outside hitter Jensen posted double-digit kills for the 16th time in 19 matches, as she had 14 kills on .310 hitting Saturday night. Redshirt freshman outside hitter Katie Stanzel added a season-best eight kills on .316 hitting and also added five blocks.

With a season-high hitting percentage of .338, the Cats bested their previous season-best of .331, which was set against Oklahoma on Oct. 9.

The Wildcats swept the Buffaloes for only the third time in series history and for the first time since 2000.

With its win, K-State improved to 13-6 on the season and 9-2 in Big 12 Conference play.

K-State travels to Lubbock, Texas, on Wednesday to battle Texas Tech (8-11, 3-7). The Cats are looking for their eighth straight win.

Fritz said the Cats aren't looking back.

"We know we can't look backwards. We really aren't going to look at our seven-game winning streak," she said.

"When we start the second half, it's a whole new season. We just have to keep our rhythm."

BAYLOR | Despite score, Wildcats display plenty of inconsistencies

Hudson said is still a concern. "He just didn't complete the ball like he is supposed to," he said. "I just got to continue to work with him because those guys are open."

"He said to me, 'The moisture is killing me coach. I just can't seem to hang on to the ball.' I told him, 'Well, they've got the same problem, and they're completing it.' So everyone has to play in the same environment."

Running back Darren Sproles did his job once again, rushing for 124 yards and one touchdown. He became the second fastest player in K-State history to reach 1,000 career-rushing yards.

Baylor, on the other hand, had less than zero success running the ball.

Coming out of the locker room, Baylor practically ditched the running attack — after the team had accumulated just five yards total in the first half — and went strictly to the air.

Zachry completed his first four passes of the opening drive, leading the Bears all the way down to the Wildcat 4-yard line.

But once again, K-State came up with a big play, as Andrew Shull blocked a 21-yard field goal attempt, and Randy Jordan returned it 93 yards for the touchdown.

It was the first time in 35 years the Cats had accomplished such a feat.

"It was a tremendous play by a lot of people," Snyder said. "We had a lot of defensive backs in there that responded well after the block, and after we got it picked up and started to return, that gave us the chance to get some blocks down field that you might not otherwise get."

By then, the Cats were beginning to pull away.

Baylor was no longer in the contest, something linebacker Terry Pierce said should have happened earlier in the game.

"When you look at a team like Baylor, you think, 'Hey, we don't think we're going to be playing for very long — our twos and threes are going to be in there,'" he said. "When you start taking a team for granted, and let a team like Baylor hang around, one or two big lucky plays, they are going to put points on the board."

On Saturday, though, the Bears weren't able to do so.

A late touchdown by Baylor did nothing more than shrink the point differential for the time being. K-State would score two more times in the fourth quarter with Marc Dunn at the helm.

But a mostly ineffective Cat offense, coupled with a defense that still gave up some big plays, proved to Pierce that K-State wasn't as ready as it should have been for Baylor.

The score and the inconsistent performance echoed that.

"I don't think it was Texas — I think it was practice and the way we watched film," Pierce said. "It showed, because we weren't as prepared as we were for the Texas game and all the big games. We just weren't prepared."

Death toll rises to 117 after Russian police raid Moscow theater

By Burt Herman
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

MOSCOW — Moscow's chief physician said Sunday that all but one of the 117 hostages who died during an operation to free hundreds of hostages from a city theater were killed by the effects of gas used to subdue their captors.

The Interfax news agency quoted Andrei Seltsovsky as saying that one person died from bullet wounds during Saturday's assault. It was the first time that a Russian official identified the cause of death of most of the victims.

The gas left many captives unconscious, and they had to be carried from the theater suffering from symptoms of poisoning. Authorities have not said what was in the gas.

An anesthesiologist, Yevgeny Yevdokimov, said the fatal effects of the unspecified gasses were exacerbated by the weakened condition of the hostages, who had spent 58 hours in captivity under high stress and with little food or water, Interfax reported.

Nearly 650 of the released hostages still are hospitalized, and more than 200 of them are in critical condition, Russian medical authorities said Sunday.

They said the death toll so far was 117.

Seltsovsky told Interfax that 646 people were in the hospital, including 150 who were in intensive care wards and 45 who were in very serious condition. He said the dead included 63 men and 54 women.

Moscow hospitals on Sunday began releasing some former hostages, but most were being kept for further treatment.

Outside one of the hospitals treating survivors, the wail of sirens mixed with the cries of relatives as doctors released some of the 750 who were rescued.

Anxious hostage relatives waited for word on their loved ones after a special forces raid on the theater Saturday killed most of the hostage-takers. The freed captives were taken to hospitals, most of them suffering from the effects of knockout gas that was pumped through the building before it was stormed by Russian special forces.

Some hospitals posted complete or partial lists Sunday afternoon of those being treated, but information remained fragmented.

A U.S. Embassy spokesman said its workers were trying to find which hospital one of the two known American hostages was in.

Fifty of the rebels who seized the theater were killed — several with bullets to the head, apparently as they lay incapacitated from the gas. About 750 hostages were reported to have been freed in the operation.

President Vladimir Putin, who visited some of the injured Saturday, declared Monday a national day of mourning.

As the troops surrounding the theater began to withdraw, people put flowers around the site.

Besides the 50 assailants the Federal Security Service said were killed at the theater officials said three other gunmen were captured, and authorities searched the city for accomplices and gunmen who may have escaped.

The chief Moscow prosecutor, Mikhail Avdyukov, said Sunday that three people have been arrested in Moscow on suspicion of helping organize and carry out the raid, the Interfax news agency reported.

The prosecutor's office could not be reached by telephone for confirmation or details.

DEFENSE | Players disappointed with performance, struggle to improve

describe the play of his secondary.

"Discerning probably as much as anything," he said. "Right at the very outset of the ballgame, we give up a play the first snap of the ball game. Jesse Tetuan slips and fell. Those are the kinds of things you can't account for, but there were other times when we had them pinned on a couple of times, had tackles, had an arm around him and couldn't bring him down, and he freed himself up and made a couple of plays."

"Then there were some times when we didn't have anybody close to where they should have been, so we had some problems in regards to the execution — the alignment and assignment in our back unit."

A big chunk of those yards went to Baylor wide-receiver Reggie Newhouse, who hauled in nine catches for 173 yards.

Newman said he would have liked to go one-on-one with Newhouse more, but Baylor's no-huddle offense in the second half didn't allow that to take place.

"We just had to stay right and left pretty much," he said. "It's a little difficult when they go no-huddle like they did."

Baylor went to the no-huddle on its first drive of the second half.

Zachry passed on every opportunity in that drive, going seven-for-nine for 68 yards.

Newman said the no-huddle was very effective, but at the same time, the Cat secondary didn't cover like it should have.

"They executed well, but at the same time we didn't execute as good as we should have," he said.

"We gave up a couple of passes that should have been covered better. We just didn't understand where we were, and that's the big focal point in our secondary."

Defensive coordinator Bob Elliott said another big focal point for the secondary is that it wasn't very healthy going into the Baylor game. That problem became greater as Tetuan got injured Saturday.

"We've got some depth problems — there's no question about that," he said. "We're getting thinned out pretty good. I'm struggling to find enough guys to play in there."

While the secondary was struggling again, the rush defense was just as good as it has been.

Baylor was held to -37 yards rushing Saturday, most of which can be attributed to the nine sacks by the K-State defense.

Andrew Shull was the leader in getting to the quarterback, as he sacked Zachry and back-up QB Greg Cicero two times each.

Josh Buhl, who also had a sack to go with his 13 tackles, said it is the job of the defensive front four and the linebackers to get pressure on the quarterback to help out the secondary defenders.

"We work as a team," he said. "The back has to help the front, and the front has to help the back. We have to have them hold the coverage so we can get some sacks, and we got to get some sacks so we can help the coverage. So it all works together."

Buhl said problems in the secondary can be attributed to not getting enough pressure on the quarterback.

He said the whole defense has to take responsibility for giving up yards, not just one specific part.

"Pass rush was good, but we need to make sure we can hold them on the back end and not give up those big plays, and maybe get a little better pass rush than what it was," Buhl said.

"Maybe we can help them out a little more. It was a good day as far as that goes, but a bad day as far as yards given up, so we have to try to get better at that."

Hale Library looks to future

Officials fear inflation, pending budget cuts

By Lindsey Tipling
KANSAS STATE COLLEGLIAN

Hale Library has been able to keep its doors open as late this semester, but no one is sure how long that will last.

Brice Hobrock, dean of libraries, said the situation at the library is serious.

"An important thing to understand is the funds for salaries and wages are very different here at the library than the academic colleges," Hobrock said. "Kansans are very proud of their system of higher education, but they aren't willing to pay more for it."

Brice Hobrock,
DEAN OF LIBRARIES

The library spends $5 million a year on books and databases.

The other thing that is different for the library is the consideration of inflation.

"Annual inflation is currently running about 10 percent, and usually the university tries to accommodate that," Hobrock said.

However, Hobrock said, this year the budget cuts have made that impossible.

"The library is losing a lot of buying power," he said.

Hobrock said that without a doubt the cutbacks will have an effect on students.

Fright Night to celebrate KSU teams, Halloween

By Edie Hall
KANSAS STATE COLLEGLIAN

Halloween is candy, kids, costumes and basketball.

Well, at least it will include basketball tonight at the seventh-annual Fright Night in Bramlage Coliseum.

The event, which begins around 6:15 p.m., is sponsored by the K-State men's and women's basketball teams and provides a safe trick-or-treating experience for community families.

Melynda Stein, assistant director of marketing and promotions at the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics, said the event is a way to give back to the community.

"The teams will be there to sign autographs, and kids can meet the teams and interact with them," she said. "It's also important these days to have a safe place to trick-or-treat."

Mike Mores, director of marketing for the athletic department, said Fright Night is also a way to kick off the Wildcat basketball season.

"It's tied around basketball. We want to push our programs, but both programs want to

Cancer research director dies

Terry Johnson remembered for contribution to cancer studies

By Jessica Pitts
KANSAS STATE COLLEGLIAN

His name, his work and his dream will live on.

Terry Johnson, director of the Center for Basic Cancer Research, died Sunday of cancer. Those who knew him said his memory forever will grace the K-State campus.

"Terry Johnson will go down as one of the giants in K-State history," President Jon Wefald said. "He was a superb scholar, an excellent teacher and a brilliant fundraiser. He will be missed by the K-State community."

Johnson, who was diagnosed with cancer in June, founded the Center for Basic Cancer Research, a non-profit organization devoted to cancer research and education, in 1980. The center's new location in Ackert Hall is named for him.

"The fact that we are now in the Terry C. Johnson Center for Basic Cancer Research sums up his life's work," said Janis Galitzer, administrative assistant at the Center for Basic Cancer Research. "He took the center from nothing to a very powerful development."

"He was an amazing fund-raiser who had strong feelings towards the center. He was able to communicate the excitement of research and what it means in the fight against cancer, and people responded to him. That is what made him great."

Johnson was a professor and the director of the Division of Biology from 1977 to 1992, after receiving his doctorate in microbiology from the University of Minnesota. He also was serving as the chief scientist for K-State's Bioserve

Terry Johnson
FOUNDER OF CENTER FOR BASIC CANCER RESEARCH

Space Technologies, a research partnership including NASA.

"He was a fine human being," Wefald said. "He was a great source of strength for the university over many generations."

Among his many honors, Johnson received the distinguished graduate faculty award in 1987, was named a university distinguished professor in 1989 and the outstanding faculty member of the year by the Panhellenic and Interfraternity Council in 1998.

But despite the awards and honors, Galitzer said Johnson was a very private person.

The cancer center was his dream, Galitzer said, and his dream, and the fight, will live on.

"The cancer center and his work will continue," she said. "It will continue, and it will grow stronger. We will do everything we can do to help his dream become a reality. His work was his life, and he will be remembered for all he has done."

FUN WITH DANCE

Dancers use body movements for communication, fun

By Kacia Seyb
KANSAS STATE COLLEGLIAN

Roz Holloway doesn't dance to be sexy or seductive.

She does it solely for fun.

"I just like to dance," Holloway, senior in social work, said Saturday at an Aggieville bar.

She doesn't hit the dance floor at Rusty's Last Chance — too few black men make up the crowd, she said. But she does dance, and so do many others — whether it's for enjoyment or as an art and whether or not they're trying to communicate through their movements.

Whitney Boomer, junior in dance and business, and president of the student dance organization K-State Dance, focuses more on ballet, jazz and modern forms of dancing. She feels something when she moves, she said, and she likes to share her motions with others.

"Some of the dances have meaning behind them, and sometimes you can see a story in it. Sometimes the audience can see that in our dancing," she said. "Sometimes it's just for us. You can feel a certain emotion — it's hard to describe. People do different things just to get the rush from it — the high. That's one of the reasons I dance — just the feelings you get from it, the excitement you get from performing in front of an audience."

Boomer's performing differs from grinding at the clubs, said Peter Renzland, swing dancing teacher in Toronto, Canada. Renzland said dancing means a social activity to participate in, while "dance" indicates a performance to watch, according to dancing.org. But to Joyce Yagerline, associate professor of dance and director of dance at K-State, dance and dancing mean the same thing.

"Dance encompasses everything — there's square dancing, country line dancing, Salsa dancing, ballet, jazz and tap, modern, dancing you see on MTV, dancing you see Paula Abdul or Michael Jackson doing. Dance and danc-

Student gunman kills 3 professors at University of Arizona, kills himself

By Arthur H. Rotstein
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TUCSON, Ariz. — A student flunking out of the University of Arizona nursing school shot three of his professors to death Monday, then killed himself as dozens of terrified students rushed to get away.

Police said Robert Flores Jr., 41, specifically targeted the instructors, killing one in her office on the second floor and shooting the others in a fourth-floor classroom as students dove for cover.

Flores walked to the front of the classroom and shot the first victim several times, then went to the back of the room and killed the second victim, police said.

Senior Julie Raymond said she was taking an exam when the gunman came in.

"We just thought that he was late for the test," Raymond said. "Then he started talking to instructors and fired shots. All of us ducked under the tables and then ran out of the room. At first, I thought it was a joke and realized it wasn't when I heard the shots."

Flores told students in the room to leave. Later he was found dead by officers searching the school.

University Vice Provost

Elizabeth Irvin said Flores had failed a pediatric nursing class and was struggling in a critical care class.

Bomb squad members were called in after a backpack or package was found underneath the gunman's body. The suspect had threatened to blow up the building, though it was unclear when the threat was made, police said. The college and nearby buildings were evacuated.

McCartney demonstrates support for organic labeling

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Paul McCartney has endorsed a ballot measure in Oregon that would require labeling of genetically modified foods.

McCartney's 30-second radio ad in support of Measure 27, which would label all foods made with or derived from genetically modified ingredients, began airing Thursday.

McCartney, who's a vegetarian, heard about the ballot measure when he was in Portland for a recent concert.

He contacted Mel Bankoff, founder of organic food maker Emerald Valley Kitchens, who said McCartney's endorsement would help the campaign.

Pat McCormick, spokesman for the campaign opposing Measure 27, said, "Other than getting (the Yes campaign) some news stories, I don't think the ad itself will do anything to change people's minds on Measure 27."

Britons weigh in on Charles

More than half of Britons think Prince Charles should be allowed to live with longtime companion Camilla Parker Bowles when he is king — but nearly an equal number do not want her to become queen, according to a new poll.

Fifty-seven percent of respondents said they would find it acceptable for Charles to live with Parker Bowles, without marrying her, while 32 percent said it would be unacceptable.

Forty-two percent thought the pair should marry, while 36 percent did not express an opinion.

Just over half of respondents — 52 percent — thought Parker Bowles should not be queen, as she would if she were married to Charles and he became king.

The poll, conducted by NOP Research Group, involved 996 people aged 15 and over. The margin of error was plus or minus three percentage points.

Debarking surgery not healthy for dogs

By Ashley Huseman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Even though the nuisance of barking is a problem for many dog owners, there may be no simple solution to the problem.

Debarking surgery, a controversial canine vocal-cord surgery that removes the vocal cords to inhibit the animal's barking, is not always the best solution to the problem, said Kathy Gaughan, D.V.M. and assistant professor in the K-State pet health center.

"We usually try to find an alternative procedure," Gaughan said.

"Stress-wise, this is not good for the dog. The procedure can make them quieter, but it will frustrate the dog even more."

The surgery can be performed in two ways, Gaughan said.

The first method requires the surgeon to go through the mouth, but this is not ideal because it could leave scar tissue. Gaughan said the other approach, which makes an incision in the neck, going through the dog's larynx, results in a smaller risk of scarring.

Deborah Diehl Nelson, D.V.M. and owner of Blue Hills Animal Hospital, Manhattan, said the surgery is risky, and dog owners should try to find an alternative approach to the problem.

"They should address the issue of why this behavior is happening in the first place," Nelson said. "Instead of a quick fix, let's try to reshape the animal's behavior so that they're a more pleasant animal."

Nelson said she believes that annoying barking may be the product of a dog with extreme territorial behavior, boredom or separation anxiety.

She said medication to relieve anxiety and collars that help control a dog's barking are more desirable solutions.

"Professional retraining of the dog and addressing the problem of why the dog is barking in the first place is a better fix," Nelson said.

Nelson doesn't think the surgery actually solves the problem of a dog barking.

"You will get a harsh vocalization, and sometimes they even have the ability to bark,"

Nelson said.

Gaughan agreed the barking will diminish, but the motivation to bark does not go away.

"It tends to be quieter, but if scarring occurs, it sounds like a smoker's cough."

Lindsay Franz, senior in biology and pre-veterinary medicine, has seen a dog that went through debarking surgery.

She said it still barked and had a rough, raspy-sounding bark.

"Barking is part of owning a dog," Franz said.

"This procedure is probably not in the best interest of the pet because it's unnecessary and can result in problems."

Putin mourns death of captives, pledges no surrender to terrorism

By Eric Engleman
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

MOSCOW — President Vladimir Putin led a national day of mourning Monday and pledged Russia would not surrender to terrorist "black-mail." Relatives and friends grieved for 118 captives who died in the siege at a Moscow theater, all but two from the paralyzing gas used to rescue them.

Using words remarkably similar to those of President Bush after the Sept. 11 attacks in the United States, Putin pledged in televised comments to give the military broader powers to move against suspected terrorists and their sponsors.

"Russia will answer with measures adequate to the threat to the Russian Federation in all places where the terrorists, the organizers of these crimes or their ideological or financial sponsors are located," Putin said. "I emphasize — wherever they may be."

Putin has said the theater raid was planned abroad, and the Russian Foreign Ministry on Monday claimed, without offering evidence, that Osama bin Laden's al-Qaeda terrorist organization was involved.

Officials said 405 of the freed captives remained hospitalized, 45 of them in grave condition. Deputy Prime Minister Valentina Matvienko said 239 people had been released.

Russian medical officials said 116 of the hostages held by Chechen rebels in a Moscow theater had succumbed to the gas, the exact composition of which remained a secret — even to medical personnel treating the victims.

Russian authorities provided the U.S. Embassy with some information about the effects of the gas, but have not told them the name of the agent despite repeated requests, an embassy spokesman said.

Doctors from a Western embassy have examined some of the former hostages and concluded "the agent they were exposed to appears consistent with an opiate rather than a nerve agent," the embassy spokesman said, speaking on condition of anonymity.

Opiates, including morphine and heroin, are derivatives of the opium poppy.

In Germany, a physician treating two former hostages said doctors would try to determine what gas was used through blood and urine tests and that it did not appear to be a known chemical weapon.

"It remains a puzzle," said Dr. Thomas Zilker, a toxicology professor at Munich University Clinic.

The U.S. Embassy spokesman also said American diplomats located a body believed to be that of a U.S. citizen who died during the hostage-taking, one of two Americans in the theater when Chechen rebels stormed it Wednesday night during a performance of the musical "Nord-Ost."

Two foreign women — one Dutch, one Austrian — and a 13-year-old girl from Kazakhstan also were known to have died.

Russian officials said 50 rebels were killed during the storming of the building early Saturday. Many of the insurgents were women who claimed to be Chechen war widows.

TO THE POINT Cutting dogs' vocal cords unhealthy, cruel

The recent trend of canine vocal-cord surgery – which removes the vocal cords to inhibit barking – might be coming to Kansas.

But we are speaking out against this inhumane procedure.

Dogs' stress levels can skyrocket, causing more frustration and anguish. Barking is their main defense mechanism, and when that is taken away, the dogs – and possibly their owners – could be in danger.

There are plenty of other options you can choose instead of having a veterinarian cut open your best friend's throat. First, figure out why your dog is barking excessively. If it is because of boredom or separation anxiety, try to give your pet more exercise and attention.

Training schools or collars that help control a dog's barking are also ways in which the vocal-cord surgery can be avoided. As a last resort, you can always give your pet up for adoption if its barking is too much of a problem.

However, pet owners shouldn't pin all the blame on the animals. You should try to reshape your loved one's behavior constructively, instead of participating in risky procedures.

Even if you do have a pet that barks, noise fines are a lot cheaper than this cruel surgery. The operation is unnecessary and could result in more tension for you and your pet.

DISTRACTING DREADS

Schools oppose students with hair in natural locks

According to Numbers 6:5, "All the days of the no razor shall pass over his head. Until the day be fulfilled of his consecration to the Lord, he shall be holy, and shall let the hair of his head grow."

In some schools, the interpretation of this verse is up for debate.

Kisteasha Lanegan, a teenager who attended Whitefish High School in Whitefish, Mont., was suspended for having dreadlocks. The Missoula Independent in Whitefish reported that according to school policy, dreadlocks and mohawks were not allowed, so she was asked to leave. After 25 days away from Whitefish, Lanegan decided to enroll in Flathead High School, 20 minutes from her home.

In the school's defense, the assistant principal told Lanegan at the end of the year that her locks would have to be gone before the start of the next school year, according to the article. When Lanegan informed him the only way to get rid of them would be to shave her head, he reportedly said, "I guess that's what you're going to have to do then."

Jerry House, Whitefish superintendent, said in the Missoula article that Lanegan was suspended mainly to avoid bullying and teasing from classmates. He stands by the school policy, and he even went as far as saying it would've been different if she were black.

"That's natural, that's expected, that's cultural. Is it natural for this white student to have this kind of hair? Is it natural for other students to ask to be moved because they say the hair smells? Yeah, we see a difference."

What House, and probably plenty of other people, don't realize is that dreadlocks are not confined to blacks.

There are Rasta-Buddhists in Japan, Maori Warriors in New Zealand and sadhus and sadhis in India – in addition to the heavy representation in Africa with Hermetic priests, the Himba in Namibia and Angola, the Turkana, Massai and Samburu of Kenya and the Baye Fall in Senegal.

Francesco Mastalia and Alfonso Pagano, who co-wrote the book, "DREADS," discovered that Bahatowie priests of the Ethiopian Coptic Church had been locking their hair since the fifth century.

During the invasion of Ethiopia by Italy in 1935, Emperor Haile Selassie I was forced into exile, and guerrilla warriors swore not to cut their locks until he was reinstated to the throne.

The book goes on to say that newspapers had been publishing photographs of Kikuyu freedom fighters "dreadlocked to project a fierce, frightening appearance during the Mau Mau rebellion in Kenya" at the same time, and Jamaicans were exposed to dreadlocks by India through sadhus, nomadic Hindu holy men who lock their hair.

Even outside of schools, dreadlocks remain a constant source of controversy.

ANGEL WILSON

There are those who complain about the look, style, smell and length of a person's locks. Locks are seen as "radical hair," and people have deemed them socially improper and unprofessional.

One of the most common complaints given about dreadlocks is they are a distraction. How is hair any more distracting than butterfly belly-button rings, colored contacts or tattoos? It is no secret students are distracted easily, but we might be underestimating their intelligence.

The societal police are apparently running out of things to focus on and are attacking things which make an individual just that – an individual. My locks are an integral part of who I am, and I don't consider them a fashion statement that can be hastily changed.

What stretches out from our heads is not merely hair, but personal antennae. Are you tuned in?

Unique costume choices make this Halloween memorable

The spookiest holiday of them all is upon us. It is a time to carve pumpkins, attend a showing of "The Rocky Horror Picture Show," eat candy and wear a costume.

The Halloween costume has become a tradition. Costumes can be scary or humorous, elaborate or simple, political or pleasant.

Here is my list of the seven scariest costumes a student can wear.

1. Budget cuts

If you dress up as K-State budget cuts you are guaranteed to make people scream. You represent tuition hikes, the decrease of services and the unknown future of our university. Warning – appearing in Aggieville with this costume might be hazardous and will definitely not help you get an after-party date.

2. Coke

Pepsi owns marketing rights to our campus, so rebel against corporate dictatorship and dress up as a good ol' can of Coke. You can be Cherry Coke, Diet Coke, Coca-Cola Classic or Sprite. You might be surprised how popular you will be. There are legions of dedicated Coke drinkers who are tired of their rights as consumers being infringed upon, not being able to choose their preferred product.

3. A squirrel

These small creatures look fuzzy and cute, but they still strike fear into the hearts of many students. Last year I was given an eyewitness account of a squirrel jumping from his tree onto the backpack of a student. The poor man was scared out of his wits and flung his backpack off and ran in circles until the squirrel withdrew.

4. Raised drinking age

There was a crazy rumor going around a while back that certain Kansas legislators were trying to raise the drinking age from 21 to 24. I am fairly certain that it was false because I could not find any research on the matter. But what if it were true? What could possibly scare a college student more than requiring an additional three years before the legal consumption of alcohol? Dress as an enacted piece of legislation and incite the masses.

5. Four-year graduate

It isn't a big deal to take even six years to obtain that undergraduate degree because the phenomenon is so common. But what if graduating in four years was actually something we all had to do? For me, the desire to graduate in four years required me to take courses during the summer and have a 21-credit-hour semester last spring. Trust me. This one is frightening.

6. Joe

Be the infamous Joe. Some will simply agree with you. Others will shriek in terror when they realize you are back to disrupt our campus once again. Either way, it could be a good time. Think of all the havoc you could wreak when you have so many people blindly agreeing with you, and what could possibly be scarier than the resurfacing of that obnoxious lime green?

7. Parking services

It drains our college-student budgets without breaking a sweat. I'm terrified by its calculating manner and lack of sympathy. After only 12 hours of a wheel lock, officers had my car towed last year. It cost about $200. That's scary for any college student, and the parents who inevitably will be asked to lend them the cash.

These costumes play on the everyday fears of students. On Halloween, dress up, have fun and put your fears to rest.

After all, what's so scary about ghouls, goblins and ghosts after you've faced college life?

My 10-year-old computer always adjusts correctly whenever we change time. Why can't the clocks at K-State ever be correct on the Monday after we switch from daylight to standard time, and vice versa?

Girls, I need a judgment call: If you're crazy about a girl who's leaving after this semester, do you make a move or just give up?

According to Cosmo, there is such a thing as penile fracture, and although it isn't common, it's incredibly agonizing and is usually the result of women on top during sex.

I said I'm a Fourum virgin, not foreign virgin.

Yep, I get that I'm tall. Stop telling me, because I already know. Thanks.

To whoever stole my shoes off my front porch this past weekend: in case you didn't notice, there's dog doo-doo all over them.

Who really goes to a party and steals dollar bills with names written on them off of a wall? Are you that broke? Oh, wait. You're probably from Riley County.

I wish the guys on the corner of 11th and Old Claflin would throw a party again. I need to get laid.

I worked at an E.R., and you actually can fracture your penis, not just bruise it.

How come I can't get a Coke in the Derby? Pepsi sucks. I hate it.

Is K-State too poor to put a horoscope in the newspaper? Come on, now.

It's not cheating if you grow your own milkweed, spread it all over your naked body and let the monarch butterflies eat it off, because it's your milkweed. It's your milkweed.

Hey, ladies, forget the Chewbacca. We want the Wookiee.

Hey, girls, who wants to see my rally monkey?

Girlfriends are a wonderful thing.

Wrecked 'em? Damn near killed 'em.

You said, "Wrecked 'em?" Damn near killed me.

See, children, drugs aren't the answer to winning a World Series ring. Just look at Bonds.

Hey, Barry, if it's about jewelry, what's the problem? You already have enough. Just look at your ear.

The only thing that keeps me going when I wake up in the morning is knowing I'm not you.

Clearly, evolution favored the rally monkey over Barry Bonds.

If you were starving to death, and you were a hot dog, would you eat yourself?

I know I would.

All I have to say is, "Walk this way."

To the cop who gave me the speeding ticket the other night: Thanks for not giving me a breathalyzer.

To the Farm Credit building at Gary Avenue and Seth Child: You're supposed to fall back an hour, you numbskulls, not spring forward.

All your hard work will soon pay off ... in bed.

Layton Ehmke's stage name is Carrot Top.

If I've said it once, I've said it a thousand times: dorm rats are dorks.

You can call me stupid, you can call me ugly. Just don't call me a dorm rat.

With all the stuff about Cox in the Fourum, it leads me to believe a lot of girls on this campus are penisenvy, or there's a lot of homosexuals.

My roommate keeps worms in the refrigerator. Does anyone else see anything wrong with that?

Oh, my god, the Fourum said, "Blow job."

To the guy who stole my laundry detergent, my laundry bag and my dirty underwear: Ha, ha.

As of Tuesday, Oct. 29, it will be exactly 103 hours, 58 minutes and 27 seconds until K-State women's basketball starts.

The engineering major guys in Marlatt are hot.

I just watched my roommate pee his pants in my bed, in my pants, wearing my boxers.

I should be studying for a test, but instead, I've been calling the Fourum.

If this is a girl checking the messages, I'm a loser, and I would appreciate a date. So if you could return my phone calls, that would be great.

I just asked out the chick who does the Fourum messages. I'm such a loser.

No, I've met some of the women at Manhattan Christian College. They just don't fulfill your fantasies.

Thank you to the guy who gave me my credit card back. I really appreciate it.

If the K-State students are going to go walking at night, they need to start wearing fluorescent material, or we're going to start plowing them over.

If you're going to go eat at Applebee's, you're supposed to tip at least 15 percent gratuity. That's the least you can do. And if you're a college student, that doesn't give you an excuse.

The lazy man's quote of the week: Progress is not made by hard work, but by a lazy punk who wants to do as little as possible.

Every year at this time-clock change, it's always the same thing: In the spring, I'm always two hours late. In the fall, I'm always two hours ahead. I do just what they say — fall forward, spring back. Huh? You mean it's not fall forward, spring back? Oh, OK.

I don't know why the guy downstairs likes Mary Kate and Ashley so much. They're not that nice.

Computer science interest declining

K-State enrollment figures illustrate trends in industry

By Pete Elsasser
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Following a national trend, K-State is experiencing a slight decrease in the number of computer science majors.

According to a report in USA Today, the downturn in the computer technology industry has led to the decrease.

Virgil Wallentine, professor and head of the Department of Computing and Information Sciences, said freshman enrollment is down 10 to 12 percent in the department, but enrollment for all other students is steady.

"It's a pretty normal reaction to headlines in the media," he said.

"The public sees what's happening and our numbers follow accordingly."

"We went through the same thing in the late '80s, and there were concerns with enrollment, but society felt no real drops."

The report stated that enrollment in a key course for computer science majors is down 20 percent at the University of Michigan. Ohio State University has experienced a decline of 30 percent in a similar course.

The report also mentioned that computer science graduates will likely be available for several years, as current students graduate. Problems could arise when this fall's freshman class graduates.

David Soldan, professor and head of the Department of Electrical and Computer Engineering, said enrollment of freshman computer engineers is trending down a little bit, but enrollment in his department is mostly holding steady.

Soldan said that although the economy is down, there is enough demand for graduates to find employment. He said one of the biggest advantages when finding a job is having internship experience.

"Hiring from pools of interns is especially common in a down market," he said.

"We've been telling our students this for years because you need at least one before you graduate. It's one of the things that will separate people."

Overall, K-State graduates from the electrical and computer engineering department are still doing well in terms of finding jobs, with only two or three graduates not having found jobs yet, Soldan said.

One of the segments of the industry that does seem to be doing well is the security sector, Soldan said.

"Right now, they need people with experience," he said.

"The government is making efforts to increase computer security. It's the one trend that I've seen, and one that does seem to be having a few more jobs."

Wallentine said he believes there are still a good number of jobs available. He said in general, the public doesn't really understand what's happening during the downturn.

"It seems that high school counselors tell students not to major and go into computer science technology," he said.

"They don't know that there is still a lot out there."

Doug Koehn, senior in computer science, said he thinks he'll be able to find a job after he graduates in May 2003.

"I really think there's pretty good potential," he said. "Even though it looks down right now, I think that in a year or two things should be looking up again."

Koehn said he chose his major because he's interested in computer programming. He said the better job market for computer science majors two years ago was another benefit to his major.

"The first two years looked really good, and everyone keeps telling you the market has a lot of prospects," he said.

"Of course, now I get to graduation time and the market has gone down quite a bit."

Virginia added to list charging sniper suspects with murder

By Bill Baskerville
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

SPOTSYLVANIA, Va. — The teenager arrested in the sniper slayings may have fired the shot that killed an FBI analyst, a prosecutor said Monday as Virginia charged both suspects with crimes that could bring the death penalty.

John Lee Malvo, 17, and John Allen Muhammad, 41, now face murder charges in both Virginia and Maryland in the three-week series of attacks that killed 10 people and wounded three. Alabama has charged them in a killing during a robbery. No decision had been made yet on federal charges.

Fairfax County prosecutor Robert Horan Jr. said evidence shows that Malvo may have fired the shot that killed Linda Franklin on Oct. 14 outside a Home Depot in Falls Church. He would not elaborate on the evidence.

The pair were charged in Spotsylvania County with the murder of Kenneth Bridges on Oct. 11 and the wounding of an unidentified woman on Oct. 4.

The murder charges were based on the state law allowing capital punishment for the killing of more than one person within three years.

In Prince William County, where Dean Meyers was slain Oct. 9 while pumping gas, a grand jury charged Muhammad and Malvo with capital murder and conspiracy to commit murder under a new post-Sept. 11 terrorism law.

Prince William prosecutor Paul Ebert said that law would allow the death penalty for both men — even the man who did not pull the trigger.

Virginia Attorney General Jerry W. Kilgore said the terrorism law gives Virginia prosecutors a "backup, another option in their arsenal" to seek the death penalty against Muhammad or Malvo if either eludes a death sentence for capital murder.

That boosts the case for allowing Virginia to try the suspects promptly, if not first, Kilgore said.

Both teams hoping to improve

Wooldridge, Patterson ready to start season

The K-State men's and women's basketball programs shared the court last Wednesday for media day.

It was Title IX at its best. It was fitting that they should share equal time, when time truly separates these two programs.

The K-State women have ascended to the top of the Big 12 Conference and NCAA women's basketball world.

With a great crop of young players, the Cats enter the pre-season picks second in the Big 12. The Cats have players on the National Player of the Year watch list. It is an exciting time for Coach Deb Patterson.

She has laid the groundwork. Players are working out alone, just to get better. This winter, Bramlage Coliseum will be packed with young girls who can watch their female idols play basketball. At times, Patterson will need to just sit back and smile. She has built a national power in women's basketball. It has taken just six years.

Had this been a higher-profile sport, she might have looked like a miracle worker. The program she inherited isn't comparable to the 2002 Cats.

Meanwhile, on the men's side of the program, the team is looking for a breakout season. The Cats are attempting to establish a program in a difficult conference, which features a legend of coaching in Lawrence, a top-20 team in Oklahoma and a three-point threat in Columbia, Mo.

How the hell do you recruit against all those factors?

To his credit, Coach Jim Wooldridge landed Marques Hayden, a kid who could make the Cats' dreams a reality. He has potential. Specifically, Hayden has the potential to make K-State's 100th year of basketball exciting.

From weaving through the K-State Sports Information Web site, it is clear the program has high expectations for Hayden. He is a highly recruited player, perhaps their most touted recruit in years.

The more quickly he develops, the more quickly K-State finishes in the top half of the Big 12. It is similar to the situation at Missouri earlier this fall in football where Brad Smith's improvement at quarterback has significantly improved that program. Hayden can do the same for the Cats.

Can he make fans dream of the future?

You get the feeling nobody

2002-03 BASKETBALL PREVIEW

THE NEXT STEP

Women's coach Deb Patterson enters her sixth year at K-State. She guided the team to a Sweet 16 appearance last year, with higher hopes for this year. Jim Wooldridge begins his third year as coach for the men's basketball team. The Wildcat men look to improve on their seventh-place finish in the Big 12 last season.

Women hoping to dance again; men set sights on league's top half

Stories by Sean Purcell | Collegian

From out of the shadows last season came the women's basketball team.

More like out of nowhere.

But in 2002, K-State isn't going to surprise anyone. In fact, teams will be gunning for them, sophomore Laurie Koehn said.

"It's going to be a lot different than last year because we're not going to have that element of surprise like we did," she said. "But it's exciting to be in that position. People are going to come out and really prepare to play us, so it's going to be fun and challenging."

K-State will face several challenges this season, Coach Deb Patterson said.

The first will come in the pre-season Women's National Invitational Tournament, set to begin Nov. 15.

The Cats will be host to two rounds in Bramlage Coliseum, opening against Ball State next Friday night.

"Starting out with the women's WNIT is a great opportunity because it will present a significant challenge for our team early," Patterson said. "We will be playing teams that were either in the NCAA tournament or in the WNIT post-season tournament, and that will be a change.

"A year ago, with our young team, we had 10 or 11 games to build some momentum and work our way up a ladder almost with respect to the competitive nature of our opponents."

Despite a tough schedule of games early on, many are focusing on where the Cats will be at the end of the season.

With a Sweet 16 berth in last year's N C A A tournament the expectations are obviously higher this year, Patterson said.

But that's just another challenge the team will have to face, she said.

"I don't necessarily look at it as pressure," she said. "I look at it as an opportunity. Every step you take as you're building a program — as

In the past two seasons, K-State's men's basketball program has been on the up and up.

Under Coach Jim Wooldridge, now in his third season as the Wildcat general, K-State has risen from last in the Big 12, to seventh last season.

Now the Cats are looking to make that jump into the upper echelon of the conference, a position that normally equals a berth to a postseason tournament.

Wooldridge said it should be noted what has been done the past two years but said he isn't satisfied just yet.

"We're still working on the foundation, aren't we?" he said. "It's like moving ahead in practice. If you don't have a foundation, you can't move very far ahead. We are still working on that foundation."

"We're still recruiting to bring in a more sound foundation. It has been duly noted from where we started in 12th place to seventh place now. That is a jump. That is something we can hang our hat on."

Wooldridge may be hanging his hat, but he's not taking off the jacket just yet.

A postseason tournament is now within the Cats' reach, he said.

The top six teams in the conference all went to the NCAA tournament last year.

That's where the men's team wants to be at the end of this season.

"We know that this year we'll again have to over-achieve in order to do that, to move up the ladder in this league," Wooldridge said. "But I think we have a collection of guys that could surprise some people and do some things that I guess a lot of people don't think they can do. We have a lot to prove, but I think our guys are ready for that kind of challenge."

K-State does have some surprising to do again, as they have been picked during the pre-season to finish next to last in the league.

This could be due because the Cats lost senior point-guard Larry Reid and stand-

Volleyball | Jensen honored as Big 12 Player of the Week

Junior outside hitter Cari Jensen was named the Big 12 Conference Volleyball Player of the Week by the league office on Monday afternoon after she averaged 5.67 kills per game on .362 hitting in helping K-State to three-game victories over No. 19 Missouri and Colorado this past week.

Jensen is the first K-State player to receive the honor this season, while it marks the third time she's been selected for the accolade during her career.

Football | Game time for Iowa State set

The football game with Iowa State visiting K-State on Nov. 9 has been selected by TBS Superstation as its national telecast that day, the Big 12 Conference Office announced Monday.

Kickoff for the game will be at 6 p.m.

The game will be K-State's second appearance on TBS this season. The Wildcats were host to Southern California in TBS' Big 12 debut on Sept. 21. It will be K-State's fourth TV appearance in 2002.

MLB | Matheny's surgery successful

St. Louis Cardinals catcher Mike Matheny had arthroscopic surgery on his right shoulder Monday to remove debris from the labrum.

Team physician George Paletta performed the surgery, which was a success, the Cardinals said. Matheny was expected to fully recover by the start of spring training.

The Cardinals said Matheny told the team's medical staff after the Cardinals were eliminated from the National League Championship Series that he had been bothered by shoulder discomfort. That led to an MRI and the decision to perform surgery.

MLB | Thomas to test free-agency

Frank Thomas will test the free-agency market after spending his entire career with the Chicago White Sox.

The two-time AL MVP told the White Sox he will exercise his right to become a conditional free agent Monday. This comes three weeks after the White Sox invoked a contract clause that allows them to defer most of his $10 million salary.

Thomas now has until Dec. 7 to sign with another club or return to the White Sox. Chicago general manager Kenny Williams and Thomas' agent, Am Tellem, said they will continue negotiations.

Equestrian team dominates field at home show, finishes 1st all 3 days

By Brent Gray
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State English equestrian team rode into its first show of the year with its sights set on three straight first-place finishes.

It came away achieving that goal in a weekend of dominating performances by the entire squad.

The Cats lapped the competition at the K-State English Show this weekend, finishing first all three days, with a combined point total of 118.

"I am very pleased with our performance this weekend," English coach Meghan Cunningham said. "It wasn't just two or three riders, but it was the whole team."

Sophomore Allison Woodworth led the Wildcats as she was crowned High-Point Rider on both Saturday and Sunday. On Sunday, the Cats set a school record for most points scored in a single show with 40.

Cunningham said she was very pleased with Woodworth's performance.

"Allison always puts out an outstanding ride," Cunningham said. "And since she's a sophomore, I expect her to be great for us for another two years. She is a very dependable rider."

On the first day of the competition, the Cats scored 39 points — placing ahead of Southern Illinois' score of 23. Sophomore Natalie Bennett snagged her first-ever High-Point Rider honors, and freshman Sarah Zerliene picked up Reserve High-Point Rider after winning a ride-off against teammate Sarah Waxman.

Cunningham said it was good to see the competition between Cat riders.

"We aren't used to the competition, but I think the girls really rode well enough to beat anyone this weekend," Cunningham said. "This weekend, our riders were just unbeatable."

The Cats came away with 39 points on the second day of competition, beating second place Truman State by 15 points.

Caring for reptiles requires significant amount of time, devotion

By JJ Duncan
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Sure that guy with the ball python wrapped around his neck at parties looks cool, but there's more to taking care of a snake than showing it off to inebriated guests.

"A lot of people don't realize what they're getting into when they want a reptile," said Pets 'n' Stuff employee Kindi Shaw, sophomore in open-option.

"I'm sure a lot of people think I'm mean when they want to buy a reptile, and I try to steer them away from it before they buy a book or realize how much it's going to cost. Once you add up the reptile and its whole set up, it is an expensive investment, and people need to think about whether they want to do that. They can't skip out on what the reptile needs just to save money."

Reptiles require varying amounts of time, care, food and equipment, resulting in a large variation in the costs of keeping one of the scaled creatures.

Shaw said a good rule of thumb when buying an aquarium is that its width should be at least one and a half times the length of the reptile, and twice its length for the length of the aquarium.

"It's a myth that reptiles grow to the size of their cages," she said. "If they don't reach their full adult size, they are either deformed, or they die early."

The most common example of reptiles not reaching a full adult size is the iguana. Before they die, iguanas should reach six to seven feet in length. They eat many vegetables and can become very aggressive as they age.

"Having an adult iguana is almost like having a child," Shaw said.

That doesn't mean all reptiles require a great deal of time, money and attention. Leopard geckos and corn snakes are both relatively low-maintenance pets, Shaw said.

Pets 'n' Stuff owner Ty Holborn breeds corn snakes to sell to wholesalers who distribute them to pet stores.

Holborn said he sold between 500 to 600 baby corn snakes over the summer, and he has a good deal of experience with them.

The snakes make good pets for first-time reptile owners because they don't require much attention or expensive equipment, and they are easy to handle since they are rarely aggressive, Holborn said.

"When they are babies, you want to expose them to plenty of human contact," he said. "As they get older, you can take them out every couple of days and they should be OK."

"Most reptiles are mostly for display. You don't get the same response from them that you would with a dog or cat, but corn snakes generally have a good disposition. They can bite, but they're not known for being aggressive."

Baby corn snakes eat a pinky mouse every two days, and adult corn snakes eat mice that are about the same width as themselves, Holborn said.

Holborn said he became interested in reptiles when he would go out camping. While backpacking in the outdoors, he became interested in snakes.

Shaw's interest wasn't piqued until she had worked at the pet store for a while.

"At first, I didn't know anything about the animals, and like most girls, I thought reptiles were gross," she said. "After a while I became more interested in them and their biology and geography. I think more people would find them fascinating if they learned more about them."

Shaw owns a leopard gecko named Simon, two mali uromastix geckos and two white-lipped tree frogs. She said the mali uromastix geckos are from a desert environment so she doesn't need to give them water. They get water from the moisture in the vegetables she feeds them.

Shaw said small details like that make it important for reptile owners to buy a recent book on the animals they choose.

Those books can be found at pet stores or book stores, and Shaw said to be leery of the Internet since sites sometimes have wrong or outdated information.

Higher-maintenance reptiles have special requirements that can be learned from pet store employees or books. For instance, chameleons can't be handled much because the animals can become so stressed in captivity that they can die.

Giant geckos can virtually never be handled since their skin falls off as a defense mechanism and they are aggressive with sharp teeth.

Equipment, bedding and food all depend on the natural environment of the reptile. Just one example of the specialization of those needs is the variance in heating, Holborn said.

"For snakes and other terrestrial animals, you want the heat source underneath them, so you should get a heat pad to put under the aquarium," he said. "For arboreal animals, reptiles that climb, you should get a heat lamp."

Providing for pythons

Ball pythons are a popular choice for reptile owners. Here is a list of things you'll need to correctly take care of an adult snake.

■ Housing

A young ball python from 16 to 28 inches long can be kept in a 10-gallon tank that measures 20 inches long, 10 inches wide and 12 inches high, but an adult snake should be kept in a 30-gallon tank or larger, measuring 36 inches long, 12 inches wide and 18 inches high. The tank should also have some sort of screen top that prevents the snake from escaping.

■ Heat

A heat mat kept under the cage is preferable for the terrestrial snakes, but heat rocks should be avoided since they provide only a centralized heat source that can burn the snake if it lies against the rock. Heat lamps can also provide an extra source of heat, but don't need to be left on all day since ball pythons are nocturnal. Also because they are nocturnal, pythons do not require the UV light that some lizards do.

■ Hide spots

In the wild, these snakes spend most of their time below ground in rodent burrows, so the cage should provide a place where the snake can hide to feel secure. These hide spots can be store-bought pieces of cage furniture, or they can be simple cereal boxes or rubber tupperware-type containers that have holes for access.

■ Water

Ball pythons come from humid environments, so the water bowl should be large enough for the snake to actually get inside. If it is covered, it also acts as a hide box. Low humidity can lead to incomplete shedding and dehydration. It may be necessary to mist the aquarium.

■ Bedding and other stuff

Newspaper or astroturf can work for bedding, but avoid cedar chips since they can release oils that are toxic to the snakes. The snakes also need to be able to move around so logs and other things the snake can climb are good. It is also recommended to provide some sort of rough surface in the cage to help with shedding.

■ Food

Frozen dead or pre-killed lab mice are recommended for younger pythons, and adults can eat a five- to six-inch rat. It is often not safe to feed the snake live prey since the rodents can fight back and harm your pet. Young snakes eat every seven to 10 days while older snakes eat every two to three weeks. After they eat, pythons will need to stay in a warm, dark place for five to six days while digesting.

David Letterman invites Schoharie, N.Y., residents to taping of his show

Residents of Schoharie, in upstate New York, are debating the top 10 reasons why they should appear on the "Late Show" with David Letterman.

Letterman wants about 475 people for a taping of his CBS late-night talk show at the Ed Sullivan Theater in New York City on Nov. 18. The show will air that night.

Camera crews have been filming in the town of 3,300 people, which is about 30 miles west of Albany.

The show will feature "people and locations that are near and dear to all Schoharians," the ad said. "And best of all, the entire audience will be made up of Schoharie residents."

Mobile Elvis display attracts weekend crowds in Council Bluffs

Call it Elvis on wheels.

A 53-foot-long trailer filled with Elvis Presley memorabilia made a weekend stop in Council Bluffs, Iowa. The display includes Presley's elementary school report cards, his favorite guitar and clothing he wore in movies and onstage.

Tour promoters said many items hadn't been seen outside of Graceland, Presley's home in Memphis, Tenn.

This year marks the 25th anniversary of Presley's death. The king of rock 'n' roll died at Graceland at age 42.

Promoter Dave Curley said Mobile Graceland gives people who might not be able to visit Memphis a look at some of the singer's personal items.

"It also educates them about the impact he had on popular music and American culture," Curley said.

Stops scheduled in November include Reno, Nev.; Los Angeles; Lake Tahoe, Nev.; San Diego; and Las Vegas.

WOMEN | Patterson's team aiming for NCAA again

you're attaining new levels of success — opens the door for new opportunities. For us to be able to string together two high-quality years, in terms of wins and losses in this league and on the national scene, would be tremendous."

Four of the five starting positions are already set, with four starters returning from last season's lineup. Koehn (3-point and 3-point percentage leader), along with sophomores Kendra Wecker (leading rebounder) and Megan Mahoney (assist leader) and junior Nicole Ohlde (points, field goal percentage and blocks leader) are locks for starting roles, with the remaining position still up in the air, Patterson said.

The Cats' returning experience can be a weapon as K-State again returns to the national spotlight this year, Wecker said.

"Hopefully, having the experience last year will help us this year," she said. "We know what to expect."

Those expectations include getting past the Sweet 16, Mahoney said.

She said it is a good possibility to go further in the tournament than they did last year if the Cats stay focused and improve in a few areas.

"We have the talent to get there," Mahoney said. "Our defense has to step up, though. We have the scorers on the other end of the floor, but rebounding is key. Those are just things in the game we have to do."

If the Cats can do those things, the sky is the limit, Ohlde said.

With four starters returning, a stronger fan base and a competitive league to compare talent, this year is exciting not only for fans, but for players as well, she said.

"There's just so much incredible talent in this league," Ohlde said. "You go down the list and all of these teams are so good, and hopefully by the end of the year, we will be on top."

COLUMN | Wooldridge deserves time, patience

wants to turn this program around more than Wooldridge and his cast of players. Still, if K-State struggles, people will question Wooldridge as a coach, which is unfair.

He deserves five or six years to turn the Cats around. That, truthfully, is enough time to bring in quality recruits and let the system develop.

Patterson needed that much time to get the women's program rolling, to get Bramlage rocking and purple pride rolling through the winter. Patterson had promising recruits who didn't always pan out.

Wooldridge deserves the same amount of time.

The thing is, he is probably under more pressure than Patterson ever was to win. Men's basketball is a higher profile sport. The centennial celebration of men's basketball is this season. It will be huge. Games will have tickets sold based on the tradition and what men's basketball once was, and, more importantly, the dream of what it can be again.

Seriously, the game is much more high profile. Along with football, men's basketball is one of the top two revenue producers. Tickets cost more, the TV contract is bigger and alumni demand victories.

The women's basketball program may be a nice story. But let's face it, there isn't a group consensus among college sports fans that the women's basketball team has to be successful or the coach will be fired. It just doesn't work like that.

Remember when K-State first got really good at football? The fans came back. Yet, even today, you have a contingent of fans who talk about being there in the stands when the team won one game a year.

That doesn't happen in women's basketball. Few fans attended the games religiously when the team lost.

There was a select group who went, but many will say the program's success is a new thing.

The game just hasn't been in the nation's psyche long enough for people to get bent out of shape about losing.

Now, though, with the tradition Patterson is establishing, K-State fans will begin to expect a winner.

The men's job is different. Fans always expect a winner. But I believe Wooldridge will win. Hayden is supposed to be a rising star. The team returns a lot of promising players.

This might be the year for two postseason national tournament bids. But time will tell. Entering the winter season we know the women should be successful. We also know the men are going to fight to improve, and show signs of magic. We just don't know how much.

Still, the potential is there for a top-half league finish. Just give the team some time. Time allows us to appreciate both teams. You can appreciate the women's program at the top and celebrate the accomplishment. It also lets you rally behind a gritty men's team that just wants to improve every day.

MEN | Wooldridge hopes for more improvement

out freshman Nick Williams.

But senior forward Matt Siebrandt said the Cats possess something they didn't at all times last year — a team chemistry.

"Everyone is together, more than any year before this, I think," he said. "That's what we need. I think last year, we came together probably mid-way through, and I think if we could have come together earlier, we would have been successful."

"I'm thinking this year we're going in the right direction already, and hopefully that will continue throughout the season."

Siebrandt said that last season the team seemed to come together only when things were going well.

K-State took out eventual NCAA tournament teams

Texas and Oklahoma State in back-to-back games last year in Bramlage. Siebrandt said this was definitely the highlight of the year.

But he said the chemistry should have been like it was after those two games for the whole year. That's the difference this season, Siebrandt said.

"It's essential. We plan on playing in the postseason this year, so every game is important," he said.

"We can't go down to the Virgin Island Tournament and not be ready to play as a team. Then we could be 0-3 out of nowhere."

"It can't be after a big game like Oklahoma State, either. It has to begin right now."

One player expected to become a leader is senior forward Pervis Pasco.

Pasco scored 12.1 points per game last year, while also grabbing 8.4 rebounds per contest.

The senior said his personal goal is to score 20 points, and get 10 rebounds a game, but added he just wants to be a leader on the team and help the Cats make that jump to top six in the conference.

"That's something I would like to have," Pasco said. "Whatever it takes to help the team win, that's what I'm about."

And what the Cats are about is making that jump to the top six in the one of the toughest conferences in the nation, Wooldridge said.

In order to do that, it will take a collective team effort, he said.

"It's us against everyone's perception of us," Wooldridge said.

"Let's go prove people wrong."

KU copes with budget cuts, begins to give out layoff notices to employees

By Nick Bratkovic
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The University of Kansas and K-State are linked in various ways, including budget funding from the Kansas Legislature.

KU is experiencing financial strife similar to K-State's because of lagging funds in the state budget.

The Kansas Board of Regents directs cuts and sets forth specific criteria for making cuts, said Dick Carter, external relations employee for the Kansas Board of Regents.

Carter said cuts are made using criteria that include strategic cuts, not cuts across the board. The criteria specified the cuts needed to ensure the quality of students' learning experience.

With those criteria, the schools took different approaches.

At KU, the cuts have meant layoffs of unclassified and classified staff, along with other reductions.

On Sept. 20, KU administrators announced they gave layoff notices to 13 employees and will eliminate up to 38 vacant positions throughout the campus. The cuts helped KU comply with the 1-percent statewide budget cuts announced by Gov. Bill Graves in August.

The cuts were the latest since June, when KU laid off 22 employees and left 32 positions vacant in response to the 3-percent budget cuts.

Kevin Boatright, KU associate executive vice chancellor for university relations, said KU's human resources office is working to reassign most of the employees but cautioned the cuts might not be over.

"Unfortunately, it probably isn't over for this year," he said. "The new governor and Legislature elected will have to deal with a future budget bracing for further cuts that might have an effect on the students. We were able to absorb these cuts and manage them with very little impact to the students. But if there are cuts in January, that may not be possible."

Boatright said the next budget projections will be released on Nov. 5, and that will play a role in potential future budget cuts.

"It will have an effect on the money we spend in January," Boatright said.

Carter said the budget crunch could continue past the foreseeable future.

"There doesn't appear to be a solution around the corner," he said.

As a result, Jonathan Ng, KU student body president, said, a student committee has been established to work with the administration throughout the process.

"We are attempting to do things more proactively," Ng said. "We have a specific student committee that meets with the provost and works on issues."

The issues include the planned tuition increases, investment strategies and the university enhancement program that officials hope will make KU a top-25 university.

The KU administration has worked to keep students informed. Chancellor Robert Hemenway is writing a monthly column for the University Daily Kansan and sending a bi-weekly e-mail to faculty and staff.

In an Oct. 20 e-mail, Hemenway said students come first, academic priorities take priority and budget cuts will not be across the board.

The e-mail also emphasized on research, and Hemenway said tuition increases should enhance students' education.

Boatright said it is part of an effort to increase communications on campus.

"I think it is typical of what he has done in recent years with the e-mails," he said. "He said recently he wants to increase the number of those he does," he said.

LIBRARY | Hale adjusting to cuts

"I come to the library a lot," Erika Copeland, sophomore in history, said. "Between classes and in the evenings."

Copeland said she uses the computers at the library to type papers and use the Internet.

"My computer at home is always in the shop," she said, "so I come here a lot."

But with the uncertainty of the budget, library hours and other functions could be in for changes.

"Our staffing for 110 hours a week is already kind of shaky," Hobrock said. "We are not an 8 to 5 operation."

The library will be closed this year between Christmas and New Year's Eve, which is not something that has happened in the past, Hobrock said.

With so many cuts, the library has been looking for ways to keep things as normal as possible at Hale, said Nelda Elder, chair of collection management.

"We are maintaining our inter-library loan services," she said. "And we are also making programming for desktop delivery of articles more available."

Elder said 85 percent of the articles will be available for desktop delivery.

Elder said students should be concerned with how the library cuts will affect them personally.

"An area that could be affected ultimately is the speed with which new material is processed," she said.

Students may not be able to read the most updated materials if this happens, Elder said.

Copeland said the library is

Budget cuts

The Collegian is exploring the effects of budget cuts made by the Kansas Legislature by analyzing each of K-State's nine colleges, along with services that affect students.

With mid-year cuts that could be detrimental to the university, higher-education funding has become a top issue in November's elections. Visit www.kstate-collegian.com to read previous stories in this series.

an important part of campus for many students.

"Almost everybody is here between classes, whether they're studying or just hanging out," she said.

Hobrock said he is aware of the importance of the library to students and hopes to be able to maintain the departments and functions of the library within the next few years.

"The assumption is that higher education has a lot of money laying around, but that is not true," he said.

The library does not have much more it can cut without making some serious changes, Hobrock said.

Hobrock said the majority of Kansans probably would not be willing to pay higher taxes to help the budget situation.

"Kansans are very proud of their system of higher education," he said. "But they aren't willing to pay more for it."

But if raising taxes isn't the answer, some students may be willing to pay higher tuition to get the kind of education they want.

"I could see them increasing tuition to help keep things like the library open," Copeland said. "In my opinion, it would definitely be worthwhile."

have a nice evening for the community," he said.

Those attending the event can expect to find a lot of candy as well as booths set up by various campus groups. The first 400 people to attend will receive a free Fright Night T-Shirt, Mores said.

"There are a lot of booths set up in the concourse. Some are a little scary, and others are playful," he said. "It's a great atmosphere with the teams sitting around the concourse, meeting and greeting all the patrons."

Mores said there will be a skit that includes K-State cheerleaders and Willie the Wildcat. There will also be an introduction of the teams.

Mores said around 18 campus organizations are helping with the event.

"It's a great community service opportunity," he said. "We've had strong support for this over the last couple of years."

The Black Student Union is one of the groups participating in Fright Night, something Erica Smith, senior in apparel marketing and design, said they'd been doing since she came to K-State.

Smith, vice president of BSU, said it's good public relations for her organization to participate in Fright Night, and is also a good community service activity.

"Parents and kids come to this," she said.

"We go out there for our organization, to gain awareness about BSU on campus."

Smith said BSU hands out candy and has an interactive booth where kids can play Halloween games.

She said she's looking forward to participating again this year.

"It's always a fun activity," she said. "And it's on a Tuesday night, which is when we have our meetings, so hopefully a lot of people will come out."

Although Mores said the event is geared toward the Manhattan community, he encouraged K-State students to attend as well.

"We'd love to have all the students come and dress up and and enjoy a whole concourse of games and candy and what not," he said. "We're hoping anyone and everyone will show up."

DANCE | On the bar, with a partner, during class: unique styles available to accommodate personality

ing is such a wide category, and it's wonderful," she said.

"My mother and father used to do square dancing - they were dancing. I used to do professional ballet dancing. We have some students who do salsa. Then you see Janet Jackson, Michael Jackson, Paula Abdul, Madonna, Britney Spears - they're dancing. There's stomping. It's a rainbow. The people at Aggieville - they're dancing, and the dance they do happens to be rock 'n' roll dancing, and there's disco dancing or techno dancing, African dancing. There's Japanese fan dancing."

So there are a lot of different types of dancing people enjoy. Erin Siemens, a Crum's Beauty College student who sometimes dances on the bar at Joe's Tap Room on Saturday nights, said she considers most Aggieville bar dancing to be hip-hop rather than rock 'n' roll. She said the motions differ from the art form of ballet.

"That's all graceful," she said. "This is more 'anything goes, have fun.' You don't have to know what you're doing. You just do it."

And perhaps individuals don't have to know what they're doing. Yagerline said all people are capable of dancing to some extent.

"I really do believe everyone can dance, but I don't think everyone can be a professional dancer," she said. "It's like everyone can throw a football. Whether or not they get on a professional team is another story."

Boomer said confidence can help all people develop dancing skills.

"If they're willing to learn, if they want to, I think they can learn," she said. "I don't know about well, but I think it's sometimes a confidence thing. I get self-conscious sometimes, too. I think everybody can dance. They just don't know it."

Women know they can dance, and they know what they're doing when they shake their bodies on the dance floor, Marvin Springer, 1998 social work graduate, said.

"A lot of females like power, control," he said. "A girl, she knows what she's doing, when she's putting her booty up against him. They want to have fun, and they just be dancing, but when it's time to go, the girls say, 'I gotta go home with my friends.'"

Springer said he thinks that when a man and woman dance at a club, for example, they're just having fun. If they're a couple, however, he said it's a way of showing affection. Yagerline said coed dancing may or may not mean something.

"It depends what your goal is. Sometimes you want to communicate a loving feeling, but sometimes you just want to communicate because the body's so beautiful. Sometimes the movement will want to communicate a feeling or a common goal."

Stress relief

Dancing can be a stress reliever for some, and the Centers for Disease and Control have even recommended it for depressed patients. If you feel like grooving your body, here are some healthy dance notes that may increase your desire to move.

1. Lowers blood pressure & increases circulation
2. Increases capacity of lungs & respiratory function
3. Slows degenerative changes in skeletal structure
4. Increases flexibility & function of joints
5. Increases muscle tone
6. Sharpens coordination, balance & reaction time
7. Improves internal organ functions by better posture
8. Improves mental health through reduced stress & depression, improved sleep & increased vigor
9. Helps overcome social awkwardness

Source: www.rjdance.com/pg-health.

Most men hope when women move their hips on the floor they're communicating wishes for further conversation, Springer said.

"The men - they're trying to find sex," he said. "You tell me what man doesn't think they're gonna get sex, bumpin' and grindin'."

Holloway, Springer's friend, said she doesn't believe all guys have the same dance mentality, but she now knows to choose her dance partners carefully.

EQUINE | Team dominates field

High-Point Rider honors went to Woodworth, and High-Point Reserve Rider was a tie, but the ribbon went to Iowa State's Jessica Katzman.

Coach flipped a coin to decide the tie between Katzman and Cat sophomore Dehlia Burdan.

On that day, the Cats saw seven riders place first and five riders take home second.

Then on Sunday, K-State finished the show the way it started, by dominating the field.

Junior Jessica Gittleman, competing in the walk trot, and Waxman, in the intermediate flat, became the first Wildcat English riders to point-up on the season. They now qualify for postseason competition.

Though the Cats overmatched the competition, there is still room for improvement, Cunningham said.

"We need to work on some lead issues and our ring presence," she said.

The Cats will have time to find those improvements. The next time they compete is March 1 at the Southwest Missouri State English Show.

The team hopes to continue its winning ways but will have to wait for the next semester. It will try to move even closer to its ultimate goal, qualifying a team for nationals, Cunningham said.

The team now holds a 50-point lead over Truman State for zone champion going into the next show.

"It is a goal to have a team take a zone and qualify for regionals, and I think this team can do that," she said. "But it's an ultimate goal to qualify a team for nationals."

Union not affected by cuts

Catering, office supplies sales indirectly hit

By Amy Preston
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When it comes to state budget cuts, one thing is certain — the K-State Student Union has not been directly affected by the drastic cuts in the same way as K-State's colleges have.

John Struve, interim associate vice president of administration and finance, said the Union is currently unaffected by the cuts.

"As far as I know, there is no direct effect," he said. "Student fees are unaffected by state budget cuts, and all of their revenue is unaffected by the state appropriation reduction."

However, Bernard Pitts, executive director of the Union, said budget cuts still have taken some toll on the facility.

"It has affected us in a couple of ways," he said. "Our budget process is based upon what we think we can have in revenue, so our budget goes as our revenue goes."

"The student fee is only about 10 percent of our operating budget," Pitts said. "But the other 90 percent is based on our other revenue sales."

Therefore, services such as catering and the sale of office supplies were indirectly hit.

"The colleges are looking at some things that could go, and catering and office supplies are those types of expenses," he said.

Bush signs election bill to reform ballots

By Sandra Sobieraj
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — President Bush signed legislation Tuesday that Congress approved overwhelmingly to correct the sort of voter registration mix-ups and confusing ballots that threw his own election into bitter dispute two years ago.

Critics branded the signing ceremony little more than "a White House photo-op."

The "Help America Vote Act of 2002" will give states $3.9 billion to replace — in time for the 2004 presidential election that will likely include Bush's bid for a second term — outdated punch-card and lever voting machines, and to improve voter education and poll-worker training.

The bill was signed too late for the vote next Tuesday that will determine control of Congress and 36 governorships.

The new law also requires statewide voter databases that are designed to make it easier to register and detect fraud.

"Every registered voter deserves to have confidence that the system is fair and elections are honest, that every vote is recorded, and that the rules are consistently applied," Bush said on his two-day respite from the campaign trail.

"The legislation I sign today will add to the nation's confidence."

West Nile detected in dog

Veterinary pathologist verifies Abilene greyhound's exposure

Patrice Holderbach
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

An Abilene canine has been verified as the first dog to be exposed to West Nile virus in Kansas, said George Kennedy, pathologist at K-State's Veterinary Medicine diagnostic laboratory.

However, this test does not prove the dog became sick as a result of West Nile, Kennedy said. Signs of the virus showed up in serum samples after being tested at the lab two weeks ago, he said.

In Abilene, the greyhound originally displayed neurological signs of convulsions, poor coordination and lethargy — symptoms associated with West Nile, Kennedy said. Though researchers could not confirm whether or the dog became infected by West Nile, the virus "does not appear to cause extensive illness in dogs or cats," according to the Centers for Disease Control Web site, www.cdc.gov.

Frank R. Jordan, veterinarian at Abilene Animal Hospital, provided care for the dog.

"I'm not convinced the symptoms we saw are related to the West Nile virus," Jordan said. "I just don't think the dog had West Nile, but it's obvious after sending the blood sample that the dog had been exposed to it."

Researchers could not definitively determine the dog's illness, Jordan said, but they knew the dog had a neurological disorder. He said the greyhound recovered by the time K-State received the test results.

"The dog is absolutely fine now," Jordan said.

However, he said, little research exists on West Nile for species other than birds, horses and humans. Dogs have tested positive for West Nile in only two states, Illinois and Louisiana, Jordan said.

"There's so much of this that has to be learned in other species," Jordan said. "We were surprised when this came back positive, and it certainly raised questions in our minds."

Basketball fans attend Halloween event

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Ghosts, ghouls, goblins and K-State basketball players filled Bramlage Coliseum last night for the seventh-annual Fright Night.

Hundreds of children and adults, some in costume, attended the free event, which was sponsored by the K-State men's and women's basketball teams.

Fright Night began around 6:15 p.m. The festivities included introductions of the players comprising K-State men's and women's basketball teams, as well as a skit and trick-or-treating for children.

There was also an appearance by Willie the Wildcat.

Nadine Garramone brought five children to the basketball kickoff event and said both she and the children enjoyed it.

"It's a safe alternative to trick-or-treating in some neighborhoods and they have a good time," she said.

The children enjoyed treats from several booths set up by campus groups, as well as autographs from basketball players.

Sophomore forward Kendra Wecker said the event helps start the season on a good foot.

"It promotes the team and gives us a chance to meet the community," she said.

The jammed-packed concourse was not the only place where action could be found.

The basketball teams and the cheerleading squads acted out a skit together that got a rise out of the crowd.

in line to get an autograph from Wecker, said he couldn't pick one favorite part — he enjoyed the whole night.

Garramone said one of the reasons she chose to bring her kids to Fright Night was because she didn't know how things would be on Halloween night.

"The main reason is I was afraid how the weather would be on Halloween night, so I wanted to do something indoors," she said.

Wecker said the event helps get the basketball players ready for the upcoming season.

"Meeting the fans gets us in the mood to start basketball," she said.

Gubernatorial candidate representatives to visit campus

Thursday's debate will showcase platforms of 'biggest and most influential politicians in Kansas'

By Tara Patty
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Manhattan community and K-State students will have the opportunity to listen to representatives from each gubernatorial campaign before the Nov. 5 elections during a debate Thursday.

The forum will take place at 10 a.m. in the K-State Student Union outside the Office of Student Activities and Services.

Kathleen Sebelius' running mate John Moore will be at the debate along with a representative from Tim Shallenburger's campaign.

Lt. Governor candidate David Lindstrom had to cancel his planned visit because the debate is scheduled six days before the elections.

The Governmental Relations Committee, a sub-division of the Student Government Association, organized the debate between the two campaigns to give students a chance to hear about issues that will affect them, Quackenbush said.

"We wanted to have a forum between the biggest and most influential politicians in Kansas," she said.

The representatives are slated to talk about issues including tuition increases, protection of rural communities and the effects of the current budget crisis on higher education.

Each of the representatives will be introduced, then each representative will have 10 minutes to talk about basic platform issues, she said.

A panel from the Governmental Relations Committee will then ask each representative three to five prepared questions before opening the forum to the audience for questions.

"We just wanted to make sure students know about the candidates," she said.

"We're putting our tuition dollars in the hands of the person that's elected."

Chris Biggs, candidate for attorney general, will be at the debate at 1 p.m., and attorney general candidate Phill Kline is sending a statement that will be read for attendees, she said.

Charles Hostetler, chairman of the Riley County Republican Party, said it is important for students to attend if they can.

"The obvious is that if a

BANTER AND BELLOW

Halloween: time to celebrate or cower away from fears

Fan of frivolous fear

Layton: I subscribe to the theory to expect the unexpected. Fear is a motivating emotion, and having the living juice scared out of you once in a while keeps it real, yo.

Halloween is for everything wicked, evil and/or dead. History tells us the Celts gathered around campfires to sacrifice themselves. Jack-o'-Lanterns were named for a man with a damned soul. He was doomed to wander earth with a lantern — lit by a coal from hell — until Judgment Day. Maybe people thought up the idea of Halloween while sitting around a campfire and agreed it was a blast to scare the junk out of unsuspecting folks.

These cats were right, and fear is highly marketable. Take, for instance, movies.

I'm all about scary flicks to get me honkin' on Halloween.

Here's a few movies for kickin' it: "The Mothman Prophecies," "Dawn of the Dead," "The Texas Chainsaw Massacre," the "Chuckie" weirdness and any venue showing the creepiest man alive: Bob Hope.

You never feel more alive than when you think the gates of hell are opening behind the couch, and an inferno has made its home on your thrift-shop coffee table.

Horror movies are imperative to Halloween — of course the whole point of a horror movie is to snuggle up to a goose-bumpin' lady.

Observe how your date melts when you offer her some hot cider or ask if she wants to help you sacrifice a goat in the kitchen to honor Samhain.

Word from the wise: use a drop cloth.

Spooked by scary stuff

Dana: I'm not so sure I like scary movies.

Fear and I have a rocky relationship. My mother claims it started when I was a wee lass of 2. My parents decided to move to the wilderness, and I lived in an attic-surrounded murderer haven.

I know I seem strong, but I've had my weaker times. Until I was older, I would clutch my blankets, hoping I would awake in the morning. The lights were on, and I sucked my thumb.

My fears took on a number of forms. Stinging pests were going to swarm above my head. Vampires stood in the corner, waiting for my slumber and tender neck.

But the worst was the murderer. Remember "The Facts of Life?" There was one random thriller episode where the girls' bodies kept turning up, and I can remember Blair wielding a knife and cackling.

I was too young for this. Blair and her knife by my bedside will never fade.

Now I like the lights off — my thumb no longer shriveled. But I still have fears. I'm scared I won't find a good job. I'm afraid I missed a class requirement somewhere en route to graduation.

With all these very real and horrifying fears, I sure as heck don't need to overindulge in creepy movies.

My fears might be more mature, but there is still one thing that will always get to me: dead bodies. So please, if you want to watch "Hatchet," don't laugh when I avert my eyes.

DRESS REHEARSAL

Sisters' tradition puts spin on trick-or-treating

By Amy Preston
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Rebecca and Shauna Coffindaffer don't call it trick-or-treating.

Instead, the sisters prefer to call their grabs for Halloween treats "candy performances" — and for a good reason.

Throughout the years, Rebecca, sophomore in English, and Shauna, junior in political science, have put their theatrical talents to the test by going around to neighborhoods in their small hometown each Halloween and performing for candy.

"We've done a lot of different things," Shauna said. "One year, we went as gypsies and read fortunes for candy. Another year, I was a vampire and Becky was Buffy the Vampire Slayer. She chased me with a wooden stake, and they loved it."

Halloween was always a featured holiday for the Coffindaffer sisters growing up.

"Halloween is really a big deal in our family, especially because we'd get around with neighborhood kids and get loads of candy each year," Shauna said.

Their performances, however, came during high school, when Rebecca became involved with singing, and Shauna's interests led her to act in school plays.

"For a while, it was all about the candy, but then we liked performing," Rebecca said.

"It's like the guy on the sidewalk playing music for money. We're like that, but we perform for candy."

As the sisters' interests grew, so did those of the neighbors from their hometown community.

Nicole Donnert | COLLEGIAN

Shauna Coffindaffer, junior in political science, reads palms during Fright Night on Tuesday at Bramlage Coliseum. Coffindaffer and her siblings dress up on Halloween and act out skits for candy.

"After the third year of performing, people started expecting it," Shauna said. "We'd hit the same neighborhoods each year. Even after we moved out of our old house, that same neighborhood expected us to come."

From fairies to elves, witches to vampires, the sisters have had their memorable moments throughout their performing years.

"My favorite performance has been Buffy," Shauna said. "I was a vampire and had these teeth that showed every time I would smile."

Rebecca agreed and said the time put into creating her Buffy look was well worth the effort.

"I came after Shauna with an actual stake I spent all night making," she said. "I got a big kick out of it because it was when Buffy was a hit, and I'm a big fan."

In an effort to save money, each year the Coffindaffers' grandmother makes their costumes.

"She thinks we're just hippie junkies for doing it but thinks it's pretty cool," Shauna said.

"She said there are worse things we could be doing."

Along with their grandmother, the girls' parents find the performances a bit childish, yet amusing.

"They think we're too old," Rebecca said. "But we tell them we're not just trick-or-treating — we're performing for candy."

This year, Rebecca and Shauna are adding another performer to their act — their 4-year-old sister Tess. After practicing and studying the movie, the trio is going to reenact scenes from "101 Dalmatians."

As for the future, the two sisters hope to perform at houses during Halloween and eventually hand the tradition down to their children.

"Someday when we have kids, we'll tell them they have to live under a theme and perform for candy," Shauna said.

"Halloween is such a fun holiday, and we enjoy this."

Student price index reveals increase in costs

Economics club project turns up 5-percent increase in expenditures

By Ashley Huseman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student costs are on the rise due in part to a tuition increase.

K-State's economics club computed the student price index and found that student prices have increased nearly 5 percent in the last 12 months. At the same time, the consumer price index, which computes prices in general, increased only by 1.5 percent, said Michael Oldfather, club adviser and economics professor.

The student price index is a project the economics club has been doing for 10 years, said Dan Parcel, senior in economics and club president. It gives economics students a way to track prices of items that are important to students.

Parcel said the student price index evaluates prices of tuition, room and board, entertainment, beer, pizza and gasoline. He said they also study the prices of a representative sample of textbooks.

Oldfather said he was not surprised by the club's findings.

"The students knew tuition had gone up, so they were prepared for this," Oldfather said. "Plus, the state budget crunch won't be ending any time soon."

Parcel said there is no reason to be alarmed by the report.

"The financial difficulties the state's having have been in the news lately," Parcel said. "That is a function of politics and lower tax receipts on the state level, and this is a good reason why students need to pay attention to the election."

Parcel cited the tuition increase as the main factor that increased the student price index, and he said that nothing else in their survey had much of an effect on the increase of student prices.

"For an undergraduate student who is a resident of Kansas and taking 15 hours, tuition was $300 more this semester," Parcel said.

Parcel said there has been a 5.8-percent increase in prices at both public and private schools across the state, and he believes the student price index may continue to rise.

"Inflation in general is trending toward somewhere between 1 and 2 percent each year," Parcel said. "If financial difficulties continue, tuition will have to be increased again."

Oldfather agreed there is a potential for future increases in the student price index.

"I wouldn't be surprised if the student price index went up a little faster than prices in general," Oldfather said.

Oldfather also said the increase in student prices hasn't greatly affected student behavior.

"It appears that students pretty much feel that a college education is still important at this high price. They don't like it much, but they realize it's still a good bargain," Oldfather said.

TO THE POINT Computerized ballots improve voting efficiency

The voting process will be overhauled by the time President Bush runs for re-election in 2004, which should help to prevent a repeat of the 2000 election fiasco.

Bush signed a bill into law Tuesday that would require states to replace punch cards and lever voting machines with computerized ballots. This $3.9 billion Help America Vote Act also provides funds to improve voter education and poll-worker training. Though the new requirements won't take effect for next week's elections, new computerized ballots are expected to be in place for the next presidential election.

Reform of the outdated voting process has been long overdue and should help ease the headaches that can occur from controversial elections. A test run for last year's gubernatorial elections in Virginia produced only one "lost-vote" as opposed to nearly 800 with the punch-card ballots.

The new system also ensures a nationwide standardized ballot system. What the states, therefore, need to do is educate voters and poll-workers in how to use the new system, helping to keep mistakes and confusion at a minimum. This is smart legislation that will improve the legitimacy of future elections.

PICKING A TARGET

U.S. should rethink Iraq situation, look at other countries

One of the best arguments for war with Iraq is America's duty to protect human rights.

For me, it's just about the only morally acceptable reason for attacking Saddam Hussein's corrupt dictatorship.

Human rights are indubitably important. But if we're going to start waging war in order to protect them, we definitely shouldn't start with Iraq. Hussein has been doing terrible things to Iraqis for a long time, but other regimes around the world have been doing worse things to more people for longer periods of time.

China, for instance, has more than 130,000 people in prison camps, according to Amnesty International. Their crime? Believing in some religion or another, whether it be Falun Gong, Islam or ever-popular Catholicism. Some of these groups have been oppressed for half a century or more, according to Amnesty.

Religious belief isn't the only thing landing Chinese citizens in the slammer. According to the Human Rights Watch, the Chinese government is acting against members of the primarily Muslim Uighur ethnic group.

Chinese officials have justified recent persecution of the Uighurs based on — get this — the American declaration of a single Uighur-run organization to be a terrorist group.

According to an Aug. 20 article in the Washington Post, the government of China also organizes aggressive family planning. In some areas of China, if a woman becomes pregnant and already has one child, she must have an abortion or suffer punishment.

Can you imagine the sort of emotional toll that could take on a woman?

China's government represses many more people than Hussein's regime does, and with methods that are just as bad as — if not worse than — his.

Strangely enough, we haven't yet attacked China and replaced its regime with one we considered better. On the contrary, we trade more stuff with China than you could shake a whole wad of chopsticks at. And I'm talking genuine bamboo, not those silly plastic ones.

Chopsticks aside, China isn't the only country whose regime is on par with Iraq's in terms of human rights violations.

Burma has an enormous number of child soldiers, according to the HRW. Most of these children are in the Tatmadaw Kyi, Burma's national army — many of them recruited forcibly.

What kind of nation recruits children as young as 11 to fight for it? Not even Hussein's regime pits children against their fellow citizens in armed conflict.

Those are just two of many examples. There are probably six or seven governments in the world whose human rights violations are every bit as bad as Hussein's.

This begs the question: why Iraq? Since there is so much pain, violence and corruption in the world, why is our presidential administration so totally focused on bringing Saddam down?

Could there really be something in the allegations of conspiracy theorists? Could President Bush be a pawn of rich oil producers who would benefit from war with Iraq?

I don't believe Bush is acting capriciously or with the sole intention of providing his oil buddies with a nice chunk o' change. Regardless of his intentions, though, he's still making our nation appear petty and selfish.

If we really are concerned about fighting for human rights around the world, we should prioritize according to the number and types of violations we see from various governments. Our first concern should be to stop pain and violence where it is strongest.

Evolution of language essential in quest for knowledge

Rudy: "They oughta call you Dictionary."

Russel: "Dictionary?"

Rudy: "'Cause words can describe you."

The preceding conversation from "Fat Albert and the Cosby Kids" is more than a funny joke. It implies one of the primary reasons we have language — to communicate.

Language is a complex system for organizing experiences into meaningful structures. Of all the behaviors in which humans engage, none is more complex and yet commonplace as speaking and listening to language, says Gary Cziko, educational psychology professor at the University of Illinois and author of "Without Miracles: The Evolution, Acquisition, and Use of Language."

If we didn't have a formal way of communicating with each other, we'd all be running around like chickens with our heads cut off, wondering exactly what was going on.

Chickens aside, words — especially when worked into phrases — can have a profound effect on our lives. In order to continue our quest for knowledge, we must also continue the evolution of language.

Language helps us accomplish things that no individual could achieve alone. Language allows people to share their experiences, successes and failures with others, making it possible for members of a community to share knowledge with one another.

Language in its more permanent written form makes it possible for us to understand something about those who lived in other places and times.

And language, both spoken and written, is essential for the development of science and technology in that it allows individuals to make ideas and theories public.

In order for communication to further evolve, we must continue to improve and expand language.

Because, without language, our basis of knowledge is nonexistent.

With that in mind, I've compiled a list of quotes to test your language aptitude. The challenge is to see how well you know some of the most famous phrases.

The answers are at the end of the column, but no cheating, please.

Let the games begin.

Stick art decorates Beach Museum lawn

Artist creates works out of tree branches, provides hands-on pieces for museum

By Tony Herrman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

He's been from Denmark to Japan to Hollywood, but now sculptor Patrick Dougherty has begun building his latest creation on the north lawn of the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art.

The project, whose working title is "Shades of Home," began Oct. 21 and will be completed, weather permitting, Nov. 10.

Dougherty has been building sculptures around the world since 1982. He said he likes the public to have hands-on experience with his art.

"It's fun and provocative," Dougherty said. "I'm interested in public interplay. It takes a lot from the artist to get people to look at the art."

All of Dougherty's sculptures consist entirely of pliable branches found in the local area of each sculpture. "Shades of Home" will consist of elm branches found mainly on the banks of the Kansas River, east of Manhattan.

"These are beautiful sticks here," Dougherty said while looking at the piles of elm branches stacked up behind the art museum. "This is going to make a beautiful sculpture."

Currently, the area where the sculpture is being built is chained off. Those involved hope the surrounding chains will come down so the public can walk inside the sculpture.

Because the sculptures are made of tree branches, each has a temporary life. All of Dougherty's sculptures last only one to two years.

However, this works to Dougherty's advantage.

"A lot of time, you see campuses without a lot of artwork because they are hesitant to approve sculptures that will be around forever," Dougherty said.

"But for one year, you can find people who will let you build on these spaces."

Dougherty is familiar with Kansas. He has worked with the Salina Art Center, the Salina Art and Humanities Commission, the Wichita Center for the Arts, and the Kemper Museum of Contemporary Art & Design.

Planning for the project began in 1999 when Dougherty was contacted by the Beach Museum.

"Our curator, Bill North, had seen works he had done in the past," said Lindsay Smith, exhibition designer for the art museum. "(North) has wanted to do a project for several years - we just had to get the funds and pick a time to get it done."

The piled-up branches that are waiting to be used in the sculpture still have most of their leaves. This is unlike Dougherty's other sculptures, which are all made of bare limbs.

"Originally, we were going to strip the branches before we started, but the leaves create change in color," Smith said. "Eventually, they'll all come off and create a bed, which will make it look more natural."

Dougherty creates sculptures year-round. However, the weather often dictates his travel schedule.

"I work throughout the Takeshi Tamura, graduate student, weaves tree limbs as he works on a living sculpture designed by Patrick Dougherty. "My sculptor instructor encouraged me to volunteer, plus I've done this type of work before in England," he said. The sculpture is being built north of the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art.

Matt Elliott

year," Dougherty said. "I like to work somewhere where it's not too cold during the winter, but often we're caught in the cusp of fall."

Sometimes people who help Dougherty are paid. However, most of the work is done by volunteers. Two volunteers on this project are Aaron McCaffery, senior in art, and Sarah Price, exhibition assistant at the art museum.

"It is a really exciting experience to help build the sculpture from the ground up," Price said.

McCaffery, whose major has an emphasis in sculpture, said he finds it very rewarding to work with an established artist like Dougherty.

"As a sculptor, it's good to work with someone who has made it," he said.

Dougherty also will receive help from students in the Department of Landscape Architecture, as well as from his sister, Kate Farrell.

Farrell, a poet from New York City, will give a presentation at 5:30 p.m. Nov. 7 at the art museum. She will speak about how experiences with nature have influenced the artistic careers of herself and Dougherty, said Katherine Schlageck, education and public services supervisor at the Beach Museum.

"For people who are not artists, it's exciting because it helps to see how artists are inspired and where visions come from," Schlageck said.

"It is a way to get inside their heads."

Visit the art museum at www.k-state.edu/bma and Dougherty's Web site at www.stickwork.net for more information about Dougherty and the sculpture.

2002-03 BASKETBALL PREVIEW

Repeat show possibleTalented Wildcat women able to dominate again

BEN FEHR

You could see it when 13,466 fans packed into Bramlage Coliseum for the Nebraska game last year.

You could feel it in sellout games with Texas Tech and Iowa State.

It was the 11,858 people at Allen Field House, mostly K-State faithful, to cheer on the Wildcats in a 65-40 romp over the Jayhawks.

Women's basketball was catching on.

And it continued to catch on in the hearts of K-State fans everywhere until, after downing both Kent State and Arkansas in the NCAA tourney, the dream ended courtesy of Old Dominion in the Sweet 16.

This year everybody knows K-State can play.

Will the Wildcats be able to dominate teams like they did last year? Is this team capable of winning 14 in a row on the way to a top-three finish in the Big 12 and a trip to the NCAA tournament?

Well, things seem to be shaping up nicely.

K-State returns four of five starters from last year's NCAA qualifying squad and has landed a preseason No. 2 selection in the Big 12.

Let's take a look at this bunch.

Big 12 Preseason Player of the Year Nicole Ohlde, who is also on the watch list for the Naismith Player of the Year award, will be the centerpiece of the Cats' offensive attack in 2002-03.

Kendra Wecker, also a Naismith watch list member, led the Wildcats in rebounding a year ago from the forward position and can post up as well as shoot the three.

Laurie Koehn, who led the nation last year with 122 three-pointers, will likely be running the show from the point.

And Megan Mahoney, a player who dished out 4.6 assists and scored 8.4 points per game last season, rounds out the fourth spot in K-State's starting five.

READY FOR ROUND 2

Women's big 3 won't surprise anyone this year

By Ben Fehr
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Last year, the women's basketball team went down swinging.

Ousted from the NCAA tournament in the Sweet 16 by Old Dominion, the Wildcats said goodbye to a season that will be long remembered.

K-State will return nine letter winners and four starters from that Sweet 16 squad this season.

But K-State's top-three scorers from a year ago are likely going to play the most crucial roles should the Cats be successful again this year.

Coach Deb Patterson said junior Nicole Ohlde and sophomores Laurie Koehn and Kendra Wecker are the foundation the Wildcats hope to build on.

"Those three — Wecker, Ohlde, and Koehn — they're just the rock," Patterson said.

"They're the foundation pieces, so to speak. They're almost immovable. It's a really solid foundation."

"In order for us to continue to be successful, the three of them will need to remain consistent in who they are and what they bring to the floor. It's amazing, in retrospect, to look at what they were able to achieve in terms of production."

And produce they did.

Ohlde led all Wildcats in scoring last season at 17.9 points per game. But not far behind were Koehn and Wecker, at 17.6 and 16.4 ppg, respectively.

Patterson said that asking for more production out of the three would be a hard thing to do.

"I don't know how much more you

Wooldridge plugs holes with new faces

By Joel Reichenberger
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The year is 2002, but for K-State men's basketball coach Jim Wooldridge, it might as well be 2000.

In that season — Wooldridge's first at the helm — the void of talent at K-State forced him to gamble and thrust inexperienced junior-college players into action immediately.

This season, Wooldridge once more is short on returning players, and low on talent at the guard positions.

He saw four of his top five scorers graduate or leave, including the guard trifecta of Larry Reid, Phineas Atchison and Nick Williams.

And again, he has turned to the junior college and high school ranks in hopes of finding a quick fix.

"We find ourselves faced with some real challenges as we did two years ago," Wooldridge said. "We know that this year we'll again have to overachieve to move up the ladder in this league."

The spots vacated by Atchison and Williams are now filled by transfer players Tim Ellis and Jarrett Hart.

Ellis comes to Manhattan from the College of Southern Idaho, where he averaged 16.1 points per game. Despite that impressive mark, Ellis said he doesn't plan on just lighting up the scoreboard at K-State.

Rather, he hopes to contribute all around the floor.

See RECRUITS Page 7

First-year men's basketball players Frank Richards, Marques Hayden, Jarrett Hart and Tim Ellis, are the foundation on which Jim Wooldridge hopes to build the program this year. The team looks to improve over its seventh-place finish in the Big 12 last year.

Volleyball looking to extend streak to 8 at UTBy Sean Purcell
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

At this point in the season, the volleyball team knows quite a bit about its opponents.

That's because the Cats have played them all once already.

When the Cats hosted Texas Tech (8-11, 3-7) back in early October, the Red Raiders took K-State to the limits but couldn't pull off the upset as the Cats won in five games.

Now K-State (13-6, 9-2) travels to Lubbock, Texas, with expectations of another tough battle.

"Texas Tech is such an emotional team," Coach Suzie Fritz said. "They can stay in long rallies, they can dig lots of balls, they play real fast — so in that way, I think they are very dangerous."

Wildcat women in Texas

"Knowing more about your team just prepares you better because we have been there before and seen them before. We're just more familiar is all, but it's always about what you are doing on your side of the net."

Since the Oct. 2 win over the Red Raiders, the Cats have won six more times, establishing a winning streak of seven — their longest since last season.

Men's golf finishes in 6th at Baylor tourney

Cats' season ends with solid effort from junior co-captainBy Tom Fontana
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The men's golf team finished the fall portion of its season Tuesday in a tie for sixth place at the Baylor Intercollegiate in Waco, Texas.

Junior co-captain A.J. Elgert had a solid tournament, finishing in a tie for 13th place with a 2-under score of 214.

Coach Tim Norris said this tournament will help Elgert heading into the winter break and help him carry over to the spring season.

"It will help his confidence," Norris said. "He feels comfortable on a lot of the courses we will play on in the spring. He hasn't been far off this year, but with this competition, you can't get yourself too far behind."

The Cats shot a 5-under-par 571 in the first two rounds Monday — but followed it up with a 6-over-par team score of 294 in the final round Tuesday.

Norris said the team played well despite the disappointing final day.

"It may not have been our absolute best golf, but we played pretty well," Norris said. "This was our first tournament on Bermuda greens, so I think we made a nice adjustment."

After struggling with consistency for much of the fall, K-State strung together three solid rounds at the 7,478-yard Bear Ridge Golf Club, Norris said.

"I thought the guys did really well," he said. "This was our most consistent tournament of the year. Today was pretty tough. The scores got quite a bit higher even though the conditions might have been easier, but they set up the course a little tougher."

Southern Methodist won the tournament with a 15-under-par score of 849. SMU was lead by Brock Mulder, who shot a 12-under-par 204, good enough to win the individual title.

K-State's next action isn't until the Rice Intercollegiate on Feb. 10 and 11 in Houston, Texas.

With exception to the first round at the Purina Classic in St. Charles, Mo., on Oct. 7, in which K-State was in last place following the first day, Norris said he was happy with the team's play throughout the fall.

"That speaks to our consistency," he said. "We went through the whole fall without a real stinker. We were very consistent and really played well from start to finish."

Kansas | Driver remains in hospital

The driver of a charter bus carrying students from the Kansas School for the Deaf remained hospitalized in good condition on Tuesday after a fatal crash.

Ronald Zimmerman, 60, of Raytown, Mo., was the last person still hospitalized from Sunday's crash, which killed one of the school's assistant football coaches.

Thirty-four people from the school, including players, coaches and cheerleaders, were aboard the bus when it missed a curve on U.S. Highway 40, went down a grassy embankment and landed upside down at the bottom of a ravine in Wallace County.

Sheriff Larry Townsend said speed did not appear to be a factor in the crash.

NCAA | Ohio State back probable

Freshman running back Maurice Clarett was listed as probable for No. 6 Ohio State's game Saturday against No. 23 Minnesota.

Coach Jim Tressel said Tuesday that Clarett needs time to recover from nerve damage to his left shoulder.

Clarett was first hurt two weeks ago in the Buckeyes' 19-14 win over Wisconsin. He reinjured the shoulder on his fourth carry in Saturday's 13-7 win over Penn State.

Big 12 | Solich still has supporters

A poll taken around the Nebraska football team's rousing, come-from-behind win over Texas A&M indicated that Coach Frank Solich's supporters outnumber his critics in the state.

The results of a statewide poll released Tuesday indicate that 53 percent of Nebraskans approve of how Solich is handling his job as the Huskers' coach.

Twenty-one percent of the 604 people surveyed said they disapproved of Solich's job performance. Twenty-six percent had no opinion.

The telephone survey was conducted Oct. 23 through Monday by Midwest Survey and Research of Omaha, a public opinion research company. The margin of error was plus or minus 3.98 percentage points.

BASKETBALL | Women looking for strong start

can expect them to produce by virtue of numbers," she said. "But hopefully, they've grown in terms of instinct, knowledge, play on the defensive end and just a greater overall understanding of the system."

The Wildcats will try to grow within the system this year with K-State picked to finish second in the Big 12. Last year, the Wildcats finished third in the conference.

Wecker said preseason rankings aren't going to change the team's focus.

"Rankings don't really mean much in the Big 12," Wecker said. "We have to come out ready every single game."

Patterson said coming out ready every single game is a lot easier when you have three starters capable of doing what Ohlde, Wecker and Koehn can.

"Those three are certainly the core group," she said. "They bring incredible versatility. Each one of them is so unique in the strengths they bring that I don't know if you could find a more significant core than those three."

Ohlde, the preseason Big 12 Player of the Year, said she is just trying to become a better player.

"I'm trying to contribute any way I can," Ohlde said. "If my shots aren't falling, then I'm going to go grab some rebounds. I'm going to keep playing tough and really work hard on the offensive and defensive end."

Koehn said her job on the offensive end, at point guard, is made easier because Wecker and Ohlde can both handle the ball.

"It's great to have teammates who are confident handling the ball," Koehn said. "You saw Wecker do it, and you saw Ohlde do it a million times last year. It really gives you confidence."

Patterson said the confidence these three players give her stems from their considerable — and varied — abilities on the court.

"Nicole Ohlde's versatility and ability to run, at her size, just separates her as a 6'5" post player," she said. "And she also has the ability to score the ball with either hand, back to the basket, as well as put it on the floor."

Patterson said Wecker has those abilities as well.

"With Kendra Wecker, you get incredible power, speed, strength and that athletic dimension our program has never had in terms of a power athleticism," she said. "And she brings the versatility of being a great 3-point shooter as well as post-up player."

Patterson said Ohlde and Wecker, paired with Koehn, give the Wildcats a complement that will be very valuable when they come out swinging this season.

She said the team is ready to go.

"With Laurie Koehn, you get that bulldog mentality as a competitor," she said. "You get the leader that runs your offense, and you get one of the best, if not the best, 3-point shooters in the country. It's amazing to see the range she brings to the floor."

"They all complement each other," Patterson said. "And I think that one thing that may lead to success for us is that they do complement each other so well."

RECRUITS | Transfers hope to advance program

He said he felt his biggest contributions to the 2002 Cats will be his hustle and his blue-collar dedication.

"I do the work, like the little stuff," Ellis said. "You won't be in the paper if you dive for the ball, but it may be the turning point of the game, so I just like doing little work. I am not worried about the big recognition, because if it comes, it will come, but it's not a big thing for me."

Joining Ellis in the battle for the two-guard will be junior transfer Hart.

Out of high school, Hart signed with Oklahoma, and even played in six games for the Sooners as a freshman.

Then, things went south. A season-ending injury, coupled with the death of a family member, proved too much for Hart, and he was forced to withdraw from school.

"I felt like I just needed to start over," he said. "My cousin passed away, and he was like my brother. It had me down, and I was doing stuff I wasn't supposed to, and I just went home. Coach Sampson understood, and I ended up here after junior college."

Wooldridge said Hart's variety of skills should allow him to play several different positions for the Cats. He could play the point, the shooting guard, or even the small forward spot if required, Wooldridge said.

"He's a jack-of-all-trades player. He shoots it. He passes it. He can play two or three different positions on the floor for you," Wooldridge said. "He can initiate a break. He can play in the half court — he can just do a lot of things."

Atchison and Williams provided solid minutes for the Cats last season and were critical components of a seventh-place Big 12 finish. Thus, there is no doubt that Ellis and Hart have big shoes to fill.

But junior-college transfer Frank Richards is walking in the footsteps of a purple giant.

He is slated to overtake the point position and will play in the shadow of Larry Reid.

Last season, Reid led the Cats in minutes per game, free-throw percentage, assists, steals and scoring.

Richards, though, said he feels his strengths are different from Reid's. While Reid assumed the role of the Cats' leading scorer — an unnatural position for a point guard — Richards hopes to be more of a true one-guard and delegate the scoring to his teammates.

"The first question everyone asks is, 'Are you ready to fill Larry Reid's shoes?'" And those are pretty big shoes to fill," Richards said. "He's more like an all-out score. I look to more pass first."

The fourth piece added to Wooldridge's puzzle will be freshman Marques Hayden.

Wooldridge said Hayden stands play plenty, and the big test for Hayden will be fully utilizing his skills. He was ranked the No. 10 power forward by RivalsHoops.com, and the No. 56 overall recruit by Hoop Scoop.

Hayden will come in as one of the most highly touted Wildcat freshmen ever.

So far, Wooldridge said, he has felt that Hayden can definitely live up to the hype.

"His talent is that of a legitimate Big 12 player," Wooldridge said. "His learning curve is that of a freshman. He has a lot to learn."

"I think the fact that he's a new player, and the talent that he brings to us, we're going to give him an opportunity to sink or swim early on," Wooldridge said. "We're going to give him an opportunity to play through some mistakes because we think he can help us in Big 12 play."

The 2002 season may well be a gamble for the Cats. But Wooldridge has grown accustomed to the challenge, and if his past gambles provide any kind of a blue print, this class could do what Wooldridge hopes — surprise people and advance the program.

"We have a lot to prove," he said, "but I think our guys are ready for that kind of a challenge."

GOING SOLO

Musician picks up guitar to create new sounds; former Urge front man to join Pomeroy show

By JJ Duncan
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It's been just less than a year since the Urge called it quits after 14 years, but front man Steve Ewing will bring his solo project to Manhattan on Thursday.

"It will be the same energetic show and voice people know from the Urge, but there will be some different songs," Ewing said. "It's more solo-oriented, funky and melodic."

That doesn't mean Ewing is trying to recreate the Urge. Ewing, who has taken up a guitar in his solo project, said his new material has a different sound. Fans can take that sound home Thursday, since Ewing will have his recently released solo album, "Here We Go Again," available for $5.

"It's easier and quicker to write songs by myself than it was in the Urge," he said. "In that band, I had to bounce the idea off five or six people. It's nice to have one or two to bounce the idea off, but with that many people, it could take forever. This makes the creative process more tolerable and faster."

Ewing also said he plans to start studio work on his new album as soon as he is off the road. The release date should be late summer.

Pomeroy has been touring with Ewing since the beginning of October, and Matt Marron, guitarist, said the crowd response to both bands has been excellent. Marron said the members of Pomeroy look up to Ewing and the rest of the Urge as mentors in a way.

"We toured with the Urge, and they helped us on the business side of things with lots of advice," he said. "Steve mentions times he remembers when the Urge was where we are, and he gives advice about whether ideas are good or bad for the band. The way the Urge did it and the way Pomeroy is working are very similar."

Nick Trotta, event promoter, said he is looking forward to bringing the bands to Manhattan after seeing them play in Lawrence, Kan. Trotta also promoted the Schwagg concert in the Wareham. He said he is glad the venue is welcoming bands again, since it is such a prime venue.

Marron said Pomeroy played the Wareham once before the opera house stopped hosting bands, and he is glad to be back.

Since Halloween is the band's favorite holiday, and Manhattan is its favorite place to play, Marron said the show should be interesting.

"It's been almost four years since we've played in the Wareham, so we're definitely looking forward to playing there," he said. "Without the Wareham, there's been no place to play besides Silverado's for a band that draws three to five hundred people."

"Silverado's isn't always the best place, because the stage is small and the acoustics aren't the best, but in the Wareham, the acoustics are really good, and it's a great place to play a show."

Ewing and Marron said they both plan to dress appropriately for Halloween. Trotta said that with the show and the costume contest, the event will be perfect for the 18- to 20-year-old crowd.

"The 18-and-over crowd doesn't have much for them, and this gives them something to do Halloween night," he said. "It gives them a chance to go out and get crazy for a while, because that's what you're supposed to do for Halloween."

Halloween festivities: costume contests unique enticement for students to dress up, go out

By J. Scott Bowman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Children seem to have it easy this time of year: dress up and you get free candy.

Now, adults have a few good reasons to dress up this year: dress up and you might win money.

Several local businesses are celebrating Halloween by having costume contests. It's always fun dressing up as a policeman or a wookiee, but the incentive of money makes it much more fun, said Kelli Benton, assistant manager at Marie's Costumes.

Benton, senior in elementary education, said contests give people a chance to have fun by dressing up as something a little different.

Halloween always is a hit with older adults for business parties, but it is especially celebrated by college-age adults for a number of reasons, she said.

"There's always a ton of costume parties everywhere," she said. "There's normally a lot of costume competitions in the area."

In fact, last year we rented out the winning costume for Rusty's Last Chance's contest."

Even though the shop rents costumes all year long, Benton said this is the busiest time of the year for rentals.

Besides all of the normal movie costume trends, she said they've seen a lot of occupational - as well as retro - costumes this year.

"We always rent a lot of gangster costumes," Benton said. "But this year there's been a lot of demand for sailors and policemen for some reason.

We're always renting the latest stuff from Star Wars, but it seems like we've rented a lot of stuff from the '60s and '70s. It seems that a lot of people are fans of the mullet from the '70s."

Follow the Aggieville Road is a costume contest involving three local bars, each awarding a $100 prize for the winner, said Blaise Fearis, bartender at O'Malley's.

"We're able to give people a chance to be able to dress up and go to a few different bars," Fearis said.

"People should come out because it's going to be a lot of fun. Besides good drink specials, people can expect a lot of crazy costumes, including bartenders that will be getting dressed up."

Transfer students face difficulties

Asking questions, researching process vital to enrollment

By Rogie Dorpinghaus
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Sean McDonald didn't realize he wasn't enrolled in a macroeconomics class until it was too late.

McDonald, a transfer student from Butler County Community College and junior in secondary education, said a lack of communication with advisers caused him to attend a course he wasn't enrolled in.

"It looked like they were typing me into the class, but they didn't tell me I needed to get the teacher's permission," McDonald said. "When I finally talked to the teacher, it was the day after you could enroll, and the teacher wouldn't let me in to the class."

Situations such as McDonald's occur, but there are people who try to help students avoid these types of problems.

Michelle Haupt, coordinator of the Academic Career Information Center, is the adviser of Phi Theta Kappa, an academic honorary that held its fourth annual transfer student workshop at the end of August.

"It's difficult for a transfer student to understand the college process here, because they understand the process somewhere else," Haupt said. "It's tough — not academically — but you just don't know the ins and outs of the university. The workshop is to help transfer students overcome some of those hurdles."

Cameron Fahrenholtz, senior in biochemistry, attended two different colleges, the second being Oklahoma Baptist University, before transferring to K-State in spring 2000.

"It's difficult to transfer unusual sciences and religion courses," Fahrenholtz said. "But I'd visit with the dean's office of the college to figure out what I needed to take here."

Out of the 22,762 K-State students, 1,635 are transfer students, said Larry Moeder, director of admissions and student financial assistance.

He said transfer students enroll after current students and before incoming freshmen. For the spring semester, transfer students enroll Jan. 14, two days before school starts.

Gunile DeVault, associate registrar, said the time between transfer-student enrollment and the first day of spring semester is a long-standing practice that was set up by an academic policy and procedures committee and the Office of Admissions.

"Most transfer students need upper-level courses, which tend to be more open than lower-level courses, which tend to close," DeVault said.

Erika Curtis, junior in public relations, transferred from Butler County Community College and said she doesn't regret attending a junior college first. She said she feels that the advantages outweighed the disadvantages.

"I'm a little behind as far as prerequisites that I couldn't take anywhere but here, but I don't regret going to juco at all," she said.

Curtis said almost all of her classes transferred. She said it cost her less to take the classes at Butler.

"A lot of people get mad because a lot of their classes don't transfer, but I tell them that's their fault. It's their responsibility to make sure they transfer," she said.

Greg Hushka, sophomore in mechanical engineering, transferred from Wichita State University.

Hushka said all his classes transferred. He said this probably happened because he only went to WSU for a year and didn't take higher-level courses.

Moeder said the best advice he can give transfer students is to research enrollment procedures and ask questions.

"Check out procedures and offerings well in advance. Don't assume it'll be just like the college you're currently attending," he said. "And don't be afraid to ask questions — even continuing students ask questions."

Federal government charges sniper suspects with murder

By Stephen Manning
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

GREENBELT, Md. — The federal government filed charges Tuesday against sniper suspect John Allen Muhammad under a 1946 extortion law that could bring the death penalty, accusing him of a murderous plot to get $10 million.

Muhammad, 41, and John Lee Malvo, 17, are already charged with murder in Maryland and Virginia in the attacks that left 10 people dead and three others critically wounded. They are also charged with an Alabama slaying last month and are suspected in a February slaying in Washington state.

The federal case could take precedence, though Attorney General John Ashcroft said negotiations over where the two men will first stand trial are continuing.

Muhammad was charged under the Hobbs Act, a union corruption law that allows the government to seek a death sentence against killers who try to extort money or disrupt interstate commerce. The charge was based on a note, found at the scene of one of the shootings, demanding $10 million.

"I believe the ultimate sanction ought to be available here," Ashcroft said, adding that the sniper slayings are "an atrocity."

Malvo was not charged in the 20-count criminal complaint, but he is identified as a John Doe in the supporting affidavit that describes some of the prosecution's evidence for the first time.

A judge must agree that Malvo can stand trial as an adult before he can be identified. The federal death penalty does not apply to juveniles, but Malvo could face the death penalty if he is convicted in Virginia or Alabama.

U.S. Attorney Paul McNulty of Virginia said it was undecided whether the government will move to the next step and obtain an indictment. But he said the complaint outlined "some of the grounds for a federal case."

The complaint names only seven victims — six killed in Montgomery County and a man gunned down in Washington, D.C.

A senior Justice Department official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said the Virginia cases were omitted because of the state's laws regarding double jeopardy — that is, being tried twice for the same crime.

TEXAS Team strong after 4 wins

K-State's last four wins (Kansas, Texas A&M, Missouri and Colorado) have all come by way of sweeps.

Fritz said sweeps are a result of consistent play throughout the match.

"I just feel good about where the team is at this point in the season," she said. "Missouri and Colorado were tight matches and could have easily gone four games had we given up or not shown composure."

"I don't think there is any secret to beating someone 3-0. You just have to have good plays over time."

The Cats have had many good plays in the past seven matches, Fritz said, but the difference has been their composure in pressure situations.

K-State may be a young team, she said, but it's not playing like it.

"They are a composed team, and they are an efficient team," she said. "When we get in pressure situations — and we have been in a lot of them — I feel confident that they aren't going to hurt themselves."

GREYHOUND | Abilene dog exposed to West Nile

Kennedy urged the public to remember the rarity of West Nile cases in dogs and humans. He said that when immune systems are compromised or weakened, the individual becomes more susceptible to such an illness.

"It is looking like, from other results around the country, that dogs can get West Nile very occasionally," Kennedy said. "But it is important that dog owners be assured that this is not going to affect large numbers of dogs."

West Nile virus can be transmitted through the bite of an infected mosquito, according to the Kansas Department of Health and Environment. As of Tuesday afternoon, the CDC had recorded 3,399 U.S. human cases and 193 deaths. There have been no deaths in Kansas.

Meanwhile, a Johnson County resident became the sixth verified human case from Kansas, said Sharon Watson, public information director for KDHE. In addition to the six confirmed cases, the KDHE has sent six more human cases from Kansas, which are pending verification, for CDC testing.

Watson said the number of West Nile cases has decreased lately, though resurgences of the virus would be more likely next summer.

"The cold weather has helped to reduce mosquito activity," Watson said. "Extreme cold weather will kill a lot of mosquitoes and cause a lot of others to hibernate. It will probably be next July that we see more West Nile cases."

Watson said that although 102 of 105 Kansas counties have confirmed at least one case of West Nile in mosquitoes, birds or horses, KDHE has ended its bird-surveillance program due to colder temperatures. The surveillance program served to track West Nile across the state.

Sheridan, Stanton and Marshall counties have not produced a West Nile case, Watson said.

CUTS | Enrollment increase helping Union cope

In addition, Pitts said the increased enrollment has helped with any shortcomings the Union may have had.

"We may have been covered with the additional headcount this year," he said. "Our food court sales remain constant and our textbook and school supplies are up."

One difference has been with the number of meetings conducted in the Union.

"We are seeing a few less meetings scheduled in the building for groups that would

Budget cuts

The Collegian is exploring the effects of budget cuts made by the Kansas Legislature by analyzing each of K-State's nine colleges, along with services that affect students. With mid-year cuts that could be detrimental to the university, higher-education funding has become a top issue in November's elections. Visit www.kstatecollegian.com for previous coverage.

have paid for those spaces," Pitts said.

The Office of Student Activities and Services has not been affected by the budget cuts. Like the Union, the OSAS is funded through student privilege fees, Gayle Spencer, coordinator of student activities, said.

As far as the future goes, Pitts said, Union officials just have to wait.

"We do a mid-year budget review in January, and we'll see how close we were to our forecasting for the first part of the fiscal year," he said.

VOTE | Parties ready to dispute ballot irregularities

But both the Democratic and Republican parties have lawyers on standby to pounce on suspected irregularities in next Tuesday's vote.

Already, voter intimidation allegations have surfaced in Arkansas, where there is a tight Senate race, and investigators are reviewing hundreds of questionable voter-registration cards in South Dakota. Justice Department civil-rights monitors have been to oversee polls in several Florida counties.

It was the 2000 Florida recount battle — with its confusing "butterfly ballots," half-perforated punch ballots and allegations of voter intimidation — that gave rise to the legislation. Bush's electoral victory over Democrat Al Gore was ultimately decided by the Supreme Court.

The president made no mention Tuesday of that Florida debacle. The state, governed by one of the president's younger brothers, Jeb, more recently botched its Sept. 10 primary.

Despite new computerized voting machines, Florida took a week to sort out technical and organizational problems and determine that Bill McBride narrowly defeated former Attorney General Janet Reno for the Democratic gubernatorial nomination.

White House press secretary Ari Fleischer, reminding reporters that Jeb Bush's reelection is the Democratic Party's "No. 1 target," was defensive about the state's spotty election record.

"Clearly there are many lessons to be learned from 2000, and the state of Florida reacted to them and has provided a tremendous amount of funding and resources to the various counties throughout Florida as a result of that," Fleischer said.

Critics accused the president of halfhearted interest.

Democratic National Committee Chairman Terry McAuliffe said Bush, who has publicly spoken the words "election reform" as few as four times in two years, was merely "posing for a White House photo-op" on Tuesday.

Rep. John Conyers, Jr., dean of the Congressional Black Caucus that held national hearings on allegations that thousands of minority voters were harassed or intimidated while trying to vote in Florida two years ago, recalled that in the summer, Bush vetoed a $400 million "down payment" on overhauling the election system.

"Without funding, this bill is an empty shell and the president's signature is a cruel and empty promise," said Conyers, D-Mich., top Democrat on the House Judiciary Committee.

Bush's televised ceremony in an auditorium within the White House compound offered a timely political perk to at least one House Republican in a tight re-election race:

Maryland Rep. Connie Morella, who voted for the bill but was not an active leader on it, was granted a spot on stage just over Bush's shoulder as he sat at an unadorned desk and inked his signature.

By 2004, all new registering voters will be required to provide drivers' license numbers, Social Security numbers, or specially assigned voter ID numbers at the polls. That same year, states will have to give provisional ballots to voters whose names do not appear on voter rolls. Those provisional ballots would be counted once valid registration is verified.

For 2006 balloting, states will be required to maintain voter registration lists linked to driver's license databases. States also will be required to have voting machines that let voters confirm the way they marked their ballot — and, if necessary, change their votes — before they are finally cast.

"The bill goes a long way toward addressing a lot of the problems, but the extent to which the bill works relies on what the states do because they are given a lot of discretion," said Tova Andrea Wang, a staffer to the National Commission on Federal Election Reform.

"A new polling machine is fine and great as long as people know how to use it, and there's no specificity in the legislation on poll-worker training and voter education."

DEBATE | Event to help voters understand issues

student has time and can attend, they can learn some information about campaign issues, and it will help them to make more informed decisions," he said.

Turnout has been decreasing every two and four years, he said. Hostetter said a small percentage of voters from K-State vote in Riley County.

"It doesn't seem to me students seem very interested," he said. "They don't even vote in their own student governing elections in large percentages."

Nicholas Bowser, president of K-State's Young Democrats, said it is important for students to be knowledgeable about candidates this year.

"The governor puts forth a budget and with it a recommendation for higher education," he said.

Bowser said making issues public for students would help combat voter apathy among this demographic. Organizations on campus have been raising awareness about the elections by sponsoring voter-registration drives.

If candidates take the initiative as well, he said, it may be the push necessary to get students in the voting booths.

COLUMN | Women have ability, talent to succeed

Combined with Kristin Rethman, this same four went 26-8 and won 13 games at home a year ago.

But Rethman is gone. It remains to be seen who is going to step up for the Cats in Rethman's absence.

To me, there were two problems with the team the Wildcats put out on the floor last season. First, with Koehn running things at point guard, there were too many turnovers before the ball got past half court.

Koehn may be the answer to her own problem this season, as the sophomore has a year of experience to draw from.

Another possibility is to go with Chelsea Domenico at the point.

The sophomore started seven games at point guard last year, and this move would allow Koehn to slide over to shooting guard.

Secondly, Nicole Ohlde got worn down from time to time last season. As the Wildcats' main threat inside last year, Ohlde sometimes had problems fighting through double-teams down low.

Kendra Wecker will help here.

Wecker is a year older and can extend the defense with her ability to shoot well outside.

She'll take some of the pressure off Ohlde with good strength and post ability down low.

Also, the Wildcats return letterwinner Brie Madden, who ranked second behind Ohlde in blocks in 2001-02.

K-State's lone freshman, Jessica McFarland, was recruited with the intention of taking pressure off of Ohlde as well. She averaged 18.7 points, 10.9 rebounds and 3.1 blocks per game as a senior at Derby High School.

The post and point positions must get better for K-State — but this is essentially the same team that put together a breakout campaign last season.

So, will K-State be able to build on the success it started last year?

It certainly looks that way.

Registered voters still able to apply for ballot

Friday marks deadline for advance registration; Web site offers online application

By Patrice Holderbach
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Although Oct. 21 marked the last day to register to vote in the general election, registered voters can still apply for advance voting ballots by mail until Friday, according to officials for the Kansas Secretary of State. Advance registration allows voters to cast their ballots up to 20 days prior to the election, according to www.absenteeballot.net.

Jolene Campbell, deputy county clerk in charge of elections at the Riley County Clerk's Office, said 1,276 voters between the ages of 18-24 had registered to vote in Riley County from July 23 to Oct. 30.

By applying online at www.absenteeballot.net, students may receive their ballots by mail and return them to the office of County Election Officer in person by noon next Monday. The ballots must be received via mail to the election office before polls close next Tuesday at 7 p.m., Campbell said.

Students should return ballots to the location of their registration, which is often their hometown election office.

In Riley County, the office is located at 110 Courthouse Plaza, 490 Humboldt St.

The general election takes place next Tuesday, but voters also may come in person to the county election office up to 20 days before, according to the Web site. Riley County advance

Holiday about more than appearances, scary costumes

By Crystal Welborn
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Halloween is here again — dust off the black pointy hat and get out the trick-or-treat bags.

Ann Puetz, junior in kinesiology, said she thought people celebrated Halloween because it is a good way to have fun.

"Halloween is a good way to get people together — it's traditional and fun," she said.

Katha Hurt, principal of Woodrow Wilson Elementary, said children are, for the most part, unaware of the history of Halloween.

"The history of Halloween and the significance of it escapes most children. I don't think children need to know of the history behind Halloween but maybe should learn when they are older," she said.

According to a book by Helen Borten, "Halloween," the modern-day holiday is loosely based on two separate holidays, the ancient Celtic holiday, Samhain, and the Christian holiday, All Hallow's Eve.

The holiday traditionally has had a lurid theme as its foundation. The Celts believed that during Samhain, the ghosts of the dead came back to earth. When Christianity took the place of Celtic religion, Christians clung to the belief that fairies, goblins and ghosts still wandered the earth on Oct. 31.

Anderson Hall experiences setbacks following budget cuts

By Scot Gammill
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The budget cuts have affected all of K-State's academic colleges, but they are not alone.

University administration offices also have suffered from the slashed budget. One area is in publications. The course catalog and line schedule have been moved to the Internet to cut back on the price of printing.

"We're taking a significant hit," Pat Bosco, dean of student life, said. "Everything from mailing to professional out-of-state travel to contracts on computer hardware and software."

The university also plans to increase the amount of money students pay for certain items.

"There will probably be an increase in user fees, transcripts and enrollment," Bosco said.

Others said they feel it is the state's job to increase fees, which would generate more revenue.

"The state should increase private funding, research and special fees," said Tom Rawson, vice president of administration and finance. "At the same time, we need to make sure we don't have a decrease in enrollment because of this."

Anderson Hall officials and staff said they are doing the best they can to keep the students happy.

"We are attempting to do everything to remain a student-centered university," Bosco said. "I'm the type to look at the glass half full, and I know it is tough to be optimistic now, but unless there is a change in our economy, it may be many years 'till we get back to where we were."

Unfilled job positions also have been dropped as a result of the cuts.

"There have been no general salary increases recently. The only time someone has gotten an increase in pay is with a change in position and increase in responsibility," said John Struve, in-

SPOTLIGHT | Weight loss

Man battles addiction, loses weight

Personal exercise, diet program changes more than pant sizes

By Crystal Becker
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

His addiction almost killed him. It wasn't drugs or alcohol — it was food.

Troy Brin, graduate student in business administration, said food became an addiction while earning his bachelor's and master's degrees in industrial engineering.

"Normally, abuse is anything you don't have control over. For me, that was food," he said.

"It was something I turned to when I was mad, frustrated or sad. It was a comfort."

Brin progressively gained about 20 to 30 pounds each year, eventually reaching more than 340 pounds.

"I never worried about it because I always held onto the hope that I could lose the weight if I wanted to," he said. "In reality, I didn't really believe that."

But Brin turned that hope into a reality, losing more than 150 pounds in just seven months, 4 to 5 pounds per week.

So what's his secret?

"Some things happened in my life that made me want to lose weight," he said.

"I started to work out to release some aggression and I figured, 'Hey, why not eat right while I'm at it?'"

Brin said he began exercising by getting up at 4:30 a.m. and working out until he went to work.

He also looked for ways to take the comfort out of food.

"I ate bland things I really didn't like that much — for example, tuna straight from the can," he said.

"I knew there wasn't any way I was going to overindulge myself on that."

Margaret Rys, associate professor in industrial and manufacturing systems engineering, knew Brin throughout his weight loss transition.

"It definitely took a lot of discipline to keep up with the diet and physical exercise," Rys said.

"You need to be pretty determined and have vision to actually do it."

Maurice Cashman, senior in industrial engineering, has known Brin since March 2001.

"I was there when he first started going to the Rec," Cashman said. "It's hard to find people that have the discipline that Troy has, especially for someone like him, who never really worked out to begin with."

Brin tells people it's tough to lose weight, but it comes down to a few simple steps.

"It's pretty simple really — you just expend more calories than you take in, and I guarantee you won't do that sitting on the couch."

"It's also an issue of self-empowerment," he said. The food had control for so many years. I'd think to myself, 'How did I let myself get this bad?'"

Brin said in order to be successful, people have to think of food as something they're addicted to.

"It is worse than drugs or alcohol, because you can completely stop using them, but you can't stop eating completely," he said.

For Brin, losing the weight began as an obsession.

"Now it's a desire instead," he said.

"I'm not nearly as hard on myself as I used to be," he said. "I'm a lot healthier now, in all aspects."

Brin said he had poor self-esteem before losing the weight, making him suspicious of others. "I felt like people were staring at me all the time, and to a certain extent, I'm sure they were."

That can build up a lot of resentment and bitterness," he said.

"I thought anyone who was being nice to me just wanted something, because they couldn't possibly like me for my looks."

Brin said he equated respecting himself with being thin.

"Now I know that there are so many things that make up self-worth — appearance is only a minute part."

Now Brin works out for two hours, five to six days per week, and routinely eats healthy meals.

"There was a point when I was losing weight that my doctor told me, 'You keep this up, and you're going to die.'"

"That scared me, and I've slowed down since then," Brin said.

Brin said it is most important to be happy.

"You have to accept who you are," he said.

"If you need to be thin to be happy, then do everything you can to be thin, but make it a desire, not an obsession."

"It's important to be healthy, but life's a lot better if you can go through it liking yourself."

Brin said people make choices all the time.

"I choose not to be heavy anymore, and that's a choice I'm going to have to live with every day for the rest of my life," he said.

"If you choose to lose weight, don't wait to start tomorrow, because tomorrow will never come," he said.

"I played that game for 10 years."

Living in fear not necessary

Help available for victims of violence, abuse

By Crystal Becker
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Fear. It's an everyday reality for domestic abuse victims. It's there when they wake up, when they leave the house and when they go to bed.

As Domestic Violence Awareness Month comes to an end, Judy Davis, director of Crisis Center Inc., said awareness shouldn't stop after October.

"It's a problem year-round," Davis said.

According to a 1998 U.S. Department of Justice report, young women between the ages of 16 and 24 experience the highest rates of violence by current or former partners.

This doesn't surprise Mary Todd, advocate for victims of sexual violence at the Women's Center in Lafene Health Center.

"Domestic violence is certainly a problem for college-age students," Todd said. "From time to time, people on this campus will come to various agencies to seek help, whether it is at the Crisis Center, Counseling Services or here at the Women's Center."

Dorinda Lambert, assistant director of clinical services at Lafene, said almost 70 percent of people using Counseling Services come in for relationship issues, and 10 to 15 percent seek help for violent relationships.

"Relationship violence is a problem on campus, just as it is a problem in society as a whole," Lambert said. "In conjunction with other services available on campus, we focus on education and prevention, making people aware of the warning signs."

Lambert said there are different forms of relationship violence.

"In relationship violence, you see a lot of concerns. Anything from emotional violence, to hitting and physical violence to sexual assault," she said. "We encourage people to get help, and learn how to handle conflict in a relationship."

Lambert said Counseling Services offers workshops as well as individual and couple counseling.

"Counseling Services assists students in seeking change in their behavior and helping those who are dealing with the aftermath of a violent relationship," she said.

Lambert said it is important to educate the community about the dangers of relationship violence.

"Students need to understand that relationship violence affects family, friends and the community," she said.

Crisis Center Inc., a 24-hour, free service for domestic violence victims offers confidential counseling, shelter and advice. The center sees 10 to 12 domestic violence victims for every one sexual assault victim. The Center sees more than 1,200 people per year, Davis said.

"We see some college students, but we know we should be seeing more," Davis said. "We strongly suspect that there is more intimate violence in dating relationships among students than we are reaching."

Davis said people in a violent relationship are often afraid to come forward.

"They fear that things will get worse if they seek help," she said. "Also, in an intimate relationship, there is a tendency for domestic-violence victims to frequently protect their partner. They tend to second-guess themselves, taking responsibility for the violence committed against them."

Davis said there is a cyclical pattern to domestic violence.

"There are extreme highs and extreme lows to a violent relationship, and that is hard for people to understand," she said.

Todd said this cyclical pattern is why abuse sufferers often take back their abuser.

"The batterer promises that he will change. The person who is battered takes them back," she said. "There is a brief honeymoon period that won't last."

Todd said breaking that cycle is the hardest part.

"When people do decide to leave, they're at an even higher risk for serious violence," she said. "That's why it's important to have a support system."

Davis said it is often hard to reach out for help because victims fear a loss of privacy.

"There is a reluctance often to reach out to family because they fear being judged," she said.

"People always say, 'why doesn't she just dump him,' but they're blaming the abuse on her. The focus should be, 'why doesn't he stop abusing her."

Todd said people should seek help from police, the Crisis Center, the Women's Center or Counseling Services if they are victims of relationship violence.

"It is a crime to be battered,"

Todd said. "Some people try to defend their partner by saying 'I know he really loves me,' but that isn't the face of love. There is no part of love that batters."

Labor party cabinet ministers resign

Sharon's coalition falls apart due to dispute

By Dan Perry
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's broad-based coalition collapsed Wednesday when Cabinet ministers from the moderate Labor Party resigned in a dispute over funding for Jewish settlements, threatening to push Israel into an election.

The crisis ended a 20-month "unity government" formed as a front against the Palestinian uprising, and could sabotage U.S. efforts to win support for a peace plan.

Sharon told parliament he would continue to lead, suggesting he would try to govern with a coalition of far-right and religious parties rather than call early elections.

The crisis was precipitated by Sharon's rejection of Labor Party leader Binyamin Ben-Eliezer's demands to cut $145 million in funds for Jewish settlements in the $57 billion 2003 state budget. Compromise proposals failed, and Ben-Eliezer resigned from his post as defense minister, followed by the rest of Labor's Cabinet ministers.

Under Israeli law, the six resignations only take effect within 48 hours, leaving room for last-ditch maneuvers. But politicians from both sides predicted Sharon's broad-based coalition was at an end.

"We must fight terror, but this is the day when we have to present a diplomatic horizon," Ben-Eliezer said, referring to peace talks with the Palestinians. "The prime minister is unable to present a diplomatic horizon."

Critics accused Ben-Eliezer of partisan politics, noting that in polls ahead of Labor's Nov. 19 leadership primary he trails two more dovish challengers, and leaving the government over a settlement dispute could boost his standing.

The budget was put to parliament after the Labor ministers resigned, and it passed with the support of parties outside the coalition — as expected — by a 67-45 vote. It must pass two more readings in coming weeks before it is final.

Several officials involved in the last-minute talks said Foreign Minister Shimon Peres, who led Labor for much of the past two decades and has been a key supporter of the unity government, tried to persuade Ben-Eliezer to back down. Peres then resigned along with Ben-Eliezer and four other Labor Party ministers.

If the resignations go through, Sharon would face the difficult choice of trying to stay afloat with the support of an array of extreme-right and religious parties — meaning political instability and constant pressures for even tougher, internationally unpopular policies concerning the Palestinians.

ALL HALLOW'S EVE

Misconceptions about holiday revealed through research, open mind

Whether you've been eagerly anticipating or cowering cowardly, today is the day to let your demons – or creative costuming – loose.

Halloween is usually regarded as a day of demons, fraught with witchcraft and debauchery coated in a thin, candy shell.

The roots of this mysterious holiday actually have little to do with Satan or his evil subjects.

Although it is difficult to explain fully the multitude of myths and superstitions regarding Halloween, the festival itself can be traced back to the Celts, whose society was formed before Christ.

The Celts held an annual celebration called "Samhain" to recognize the end of summer, according to www.religioustolerance.org, a Web site run by the Ontario Consultants on Religious Tolerance, an agency that promotes religious freedom.

It was believed that the "veil between this world and the next" was thinnest during this passage between summer and fall, which allowed the deceased to return. Their souls were carried via animal – often a black cat – which explains the fear of such felines to date.

So, the fear of our dearly departed is explained, but what of the costumes, pumpkins and trick-or-treating that are staples of this fine holiday?

The Celtic influence yielded these traditional symbols as well.

Since the Celts were afraid of spirits inhabiting their bodies, they would dress as ghouls themselves, hoping to trick or scare the spirits away. They darkened their homes, making them as uninviting as possible. However, Samhain was a festival of fire, and hilltops were often ablaze in celebration. When returning home from the festivities, the townspeople carried embers from the fire in a gourd or turnip, and often carved menacing faces into their gourds, hoping to keep lost spirits at bay.

The term "Jack-o'-lantern" is based on an Irish folk tale from the 18th century, according to www.theholidayspot.com, a multi-holiday information guide.

Jack, a mischievous drunk, convinced the devil to climb a fruit tree and throw some apples down to him. Once the devil was up the tree, Jack carved a cross in its trunk, hindering Satan from climbing back down. Jack made a deal with the devil, who promised to relinquish any rights to Jack's soul when he died. Unfortunately for Jack, God didn't want Jack's soul either. Satan offered him an ember and a gourd to carry the small flame, as Jack aimlessly wandered the darkness of Earth for all eternity.

The Jack-o'-lantern idea was imported with the Irish in the mid-1800s due to the great potato famine. The Irish used pumpkins rather than turnips to decorate their homes during this early fall festival, since they were plentiful and easier to carve.

Trick-or-treating has its roots in both Irish and English culture. During Samhain, the Celts would go door to door collecting food to donate to their deities, according to www.religioustolerance.org. On All Souls' Day, European Christians traditionally traveled through neighborhoods, asking for "soul cakes" or currant buns. They would, in turn, pray for the souls of each family's newly departed. The prayers of any, even strangers, were believed to help the recently deceased into heaven.

Although Halloween was not initially a sacrilegious day, the ancient fear of wandering spirits has been misconstrued into demon worship and the evil plotting of Satan, as the Church Lady would warn us.

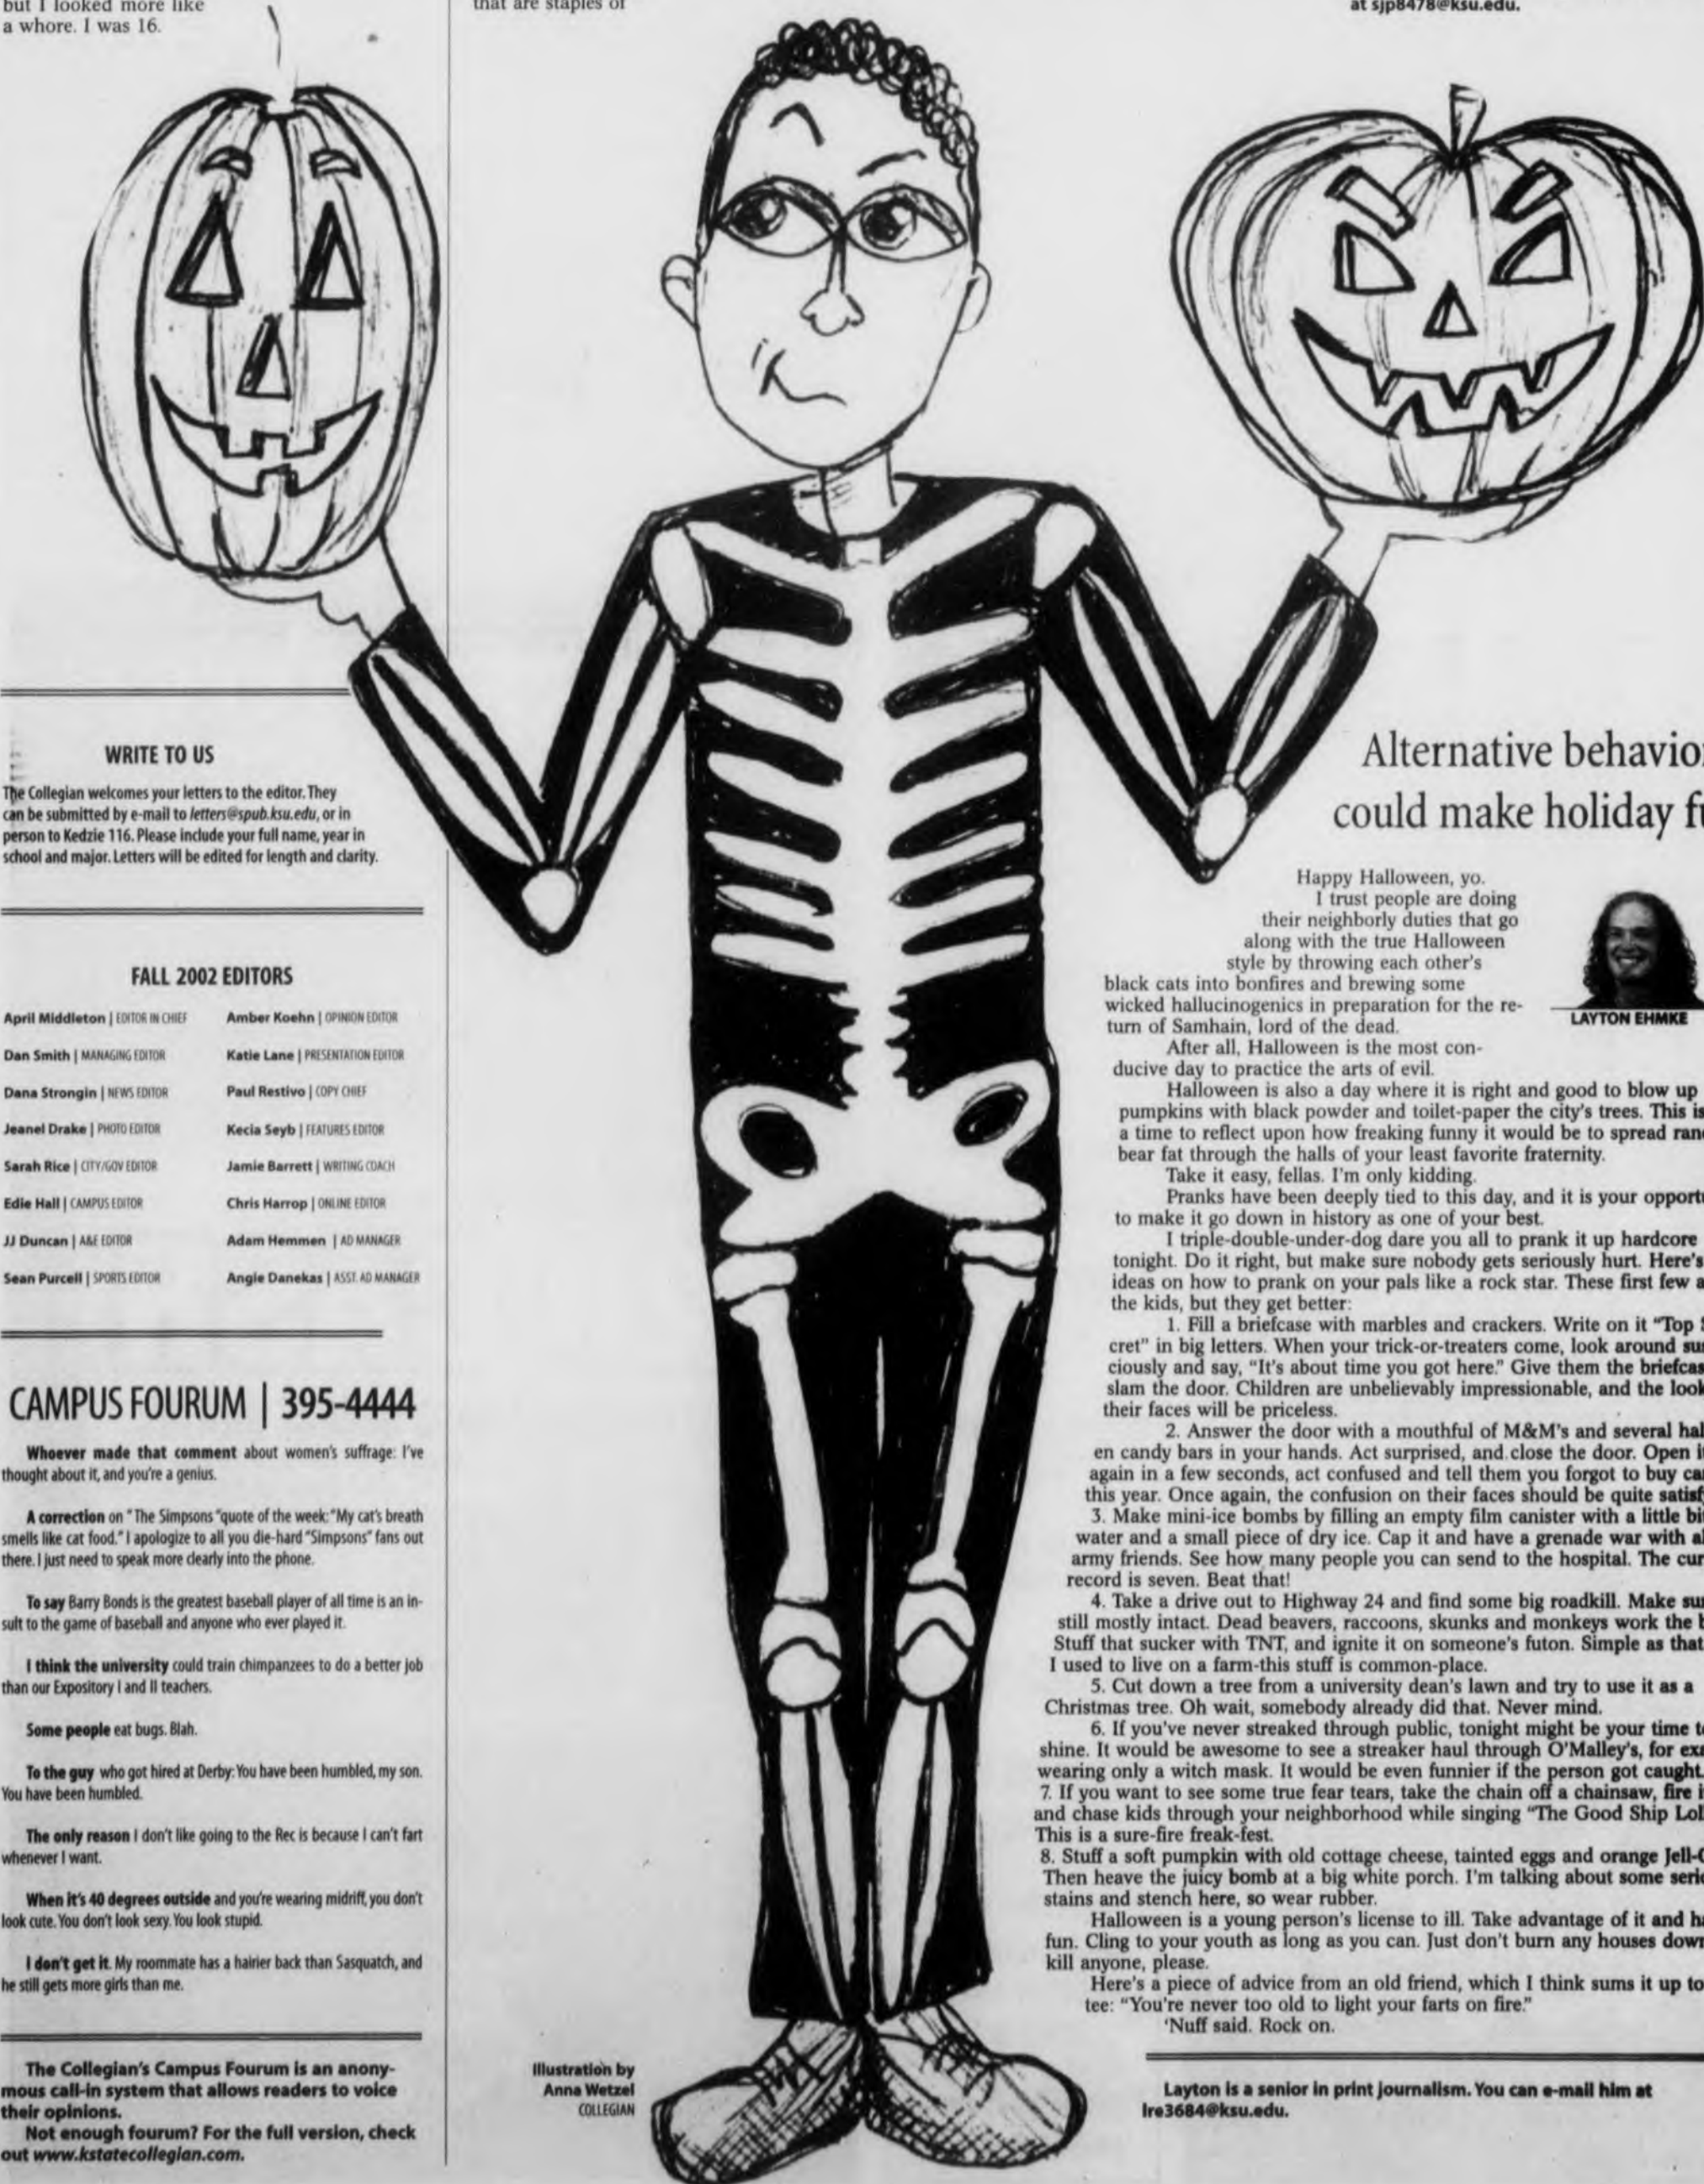

So, let's quell our fears, don our crazy apparel and drown in Smarties and candy corn.

Oh, and leave a sandwich out by your pumpkin for Jack. I'm sure he's quite famished by now.

Alternative behavior could make holiday fun

Happy Halloween, yo. I trust people are doing their neighborly duties that go along with the true Halloween style by throwing each other's black cats into bonfires and brewing some wicked hallucinogenics in preparation for the return of Samhain, lord of the dead.

After all, Halloween is the most conducive day to practice the arts of evil.

Halloween is also a day where it is right and good to blow up pumpkins with black powder and toilet-paper the city's trees. This is also a time to reflect upon how freaking funny it would be to spread rancid bear fat through the halls of your least favorite fraternity.

Take it easy, fellas. I'm only kidding.

Pranks have been deeply tied to this day, and it is your opportunity to make it go down in history as one of your best.

I triple-double-under-dog dare you all to prank it up hardcore tonight. Do it right, but make sure nobody gets seriously hurt. Here's a few ideas on how to prank on your pals like a rock star. These first few are for the kids, but they get better:

1. Fill a briefcase with marbles and crackers. Write on it "Top Secret" in big letters. When your trick-or-treaters come, look around suspiciously and say, "It's about time you got here." Give them the briefcase, and slam the door. Children are unbelievably impressionable, and the looks on their faces will be priceless.

2. Answer the door with a mouthful of M&M's and several half-eaten candy bars in your hands. Act surprised, and close the door. Open it again in a few seconds, act confused and tell them you forgot to buy candy this year. Once again, the confusion on their faces should be quite satisfying.

3. Make mini-ice bombs by filling an empty film canister with a little bit of water and a small piece of dry ice. Cap it and have a grenade war with all your army friends. See how many people you can send to the hospital. The current record is seven. Beat that!

4. Take a drive out to Highway 24 and find some big roadkill. Make sure it is still mostly intact. Dead beavers, raccoons, skunks and monkeys work the best. Stuff that sucker with TNT, and ignite it on someone's futon. Simple as that. Hey, I used to live on a farm—this stuff is common-place.

5. Cut down a tree from a university dean's lawn and try to use it as a Christmas tree. Oh wait, somebody already did that. Never mind.

6. If you've never streaked through public, tonight might be your time to shine. It would be awesome to see a streaker haul through O'Malley's, for example, wearing only a witch mask. It would be even funnier if the person got caught.

7. If you want to see some true fear tears, take the chain off a chainsaw, fire it up, and chase kids through your neighborhood while singing "The Good Ship Lollipop." This is a sure-fire freak-fest.

8. Stuff a soft pumpkin with old cottage cheese, tainted eggs and orange Jell-O. Then heave the juicy bomb at a big white porch. I'm talking about some serious stains and stench here, so wear rubber.

Halloween is a young person's license to ill. Take advantage of it and have fun. Cling to your youth as long as you can. Just don't burn any houses down or kill anyone, please.

Here's a piece of advice from an old friend, which I think sums it up to a tee: "You're never too old to light your farts on fire."

'Nuff said. Rock on.

Campus groups to offer several events tonight

changes as they get older. While children may enjoy dressing up to go trick-or-treating, college-aged people dress up to get into the scary spirit of the holiday.

The Union Program Council recently presented its annual showing of "The Rocky Horror Picture Show."

Dana Watts, UPC program adviser, said college students have an interest in scary things, and that interest helped make the program hugely successful.

"It gives people a chance to dress up — dressing up is a huge part of Rocky Horror," she said. "We all have an interest or curiosity in the occult plus the thrill of scary things."

UPC is not the only group on campus getting into the Halloween spirit. The Putnam Hall Philanthropy Department is putting on a program for community children called "Putnam HALLOWeen" from 6 to 8 tonight.

"We knew the kids always came into the dorms for trick-or-treating, and we wanted to get them onto the campus and into the dorms for different reasons like games and the haunted house," Puetz, the department's president, said.

Puetz said the event will include a scary hallway and a carnival in the Putnam lobby where the children can win prizes. The department also will be taking donations for the Flint Hills Breadbasket.

Hurt said no matter what age you are, Halloween can be fun.

"It's the most popular holiday celebration. I think it's because people can use their imaginations and can be what they want to be or what they have thought about being," she said.

Police provide need-to-know safety tips for Halloween revelry

By Amy Link
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Halloween can be a night of fun, a chance to be someone else and a time to celebrate with friends.

"We're going as burritos," Jonathan George said.

George, junior in psychology, said he is going to spend Halloween at a friend's costume party. His friend, Brad Simmons, sophomore in journalism, is also planning on celebrating with people he knows.

While some might be concerned about safety and getting in trouble on Halloween, George and Simmons said they are not concerned.

"It's pretty much the same as any other night," Simmons said.

Lt. Michael Quintanar of the Riley County Police Department said department authorities do not increase the number of officers on patrol Halloween night, but they do expect more parties and noise complaints than other nights.

Quintanar said the police also receive quite a few calls about pranks on Halloween. He said Halloween seems to lessen students' inhibitions.

"There's something about putting on a mask that gives people more anonymity to be more daring than they normally would be," Quintanar said.

Quintanar said there are usually more people on the streets walking to parties and large crowds of people dressed up heading to Aggieville.

Abby Richmond, senior in public relations, will be one of those wearing costumes and celebrating in Aggieville. She plans to spend her Halloween at the bars.

"I am going as Ginger Spice. I'm going to learn the moves tonight," Richmond said.

Quintanar offered some advice for those who plan to go out and celebrate.

He said the department's biggest concern is people who are walking while intoxicated and not watching for cars.

"Be sure to have a designated driver. If you are walking, make sure your costume has good visibility so that you can watch for cars," Quintanar said.

"I know people often have house parties as a way to make sure that everyone will stay there, which can be good," he said. "If you have a party, make sure you know who is coming to your party."

premiums, so now people are pretty much getting less. It really is appalling," he said.

The increase of the insurance premiums is one thing that led to some of the cuts, along with personal and corporation tax being down.

"The 27-percent premium was $2.5 million we didn't have, and with the taxes being down, it didn't help," Rawson said.

"An important thing to remember is that 46 or 47 of the 50 states are also having fiscal stress. It isn't just Kansas State."

The morale among the Anderson Hall staff is very gloomy, Rawson said, but administration officials know they can get through it.

"I know everyone is feeling really overwhelmed right now," Rawson said. "They have more responsibility now, but I am sure we will get the job done well."

Ed Rice, associate vice president of the administration and finance division of facilities, agreed with Rawson.

"I know it's tiring, and it's a definite load on the staff, but we will get through it," Rice said.

The office is doing a budget planning session for next year. After a new governor is elected, staff will look at the problems the university faces.

"I would like to see our problem solved by bettering state income and tax revenue being increased," Rawson said. "It's much more a state issue than a K-State issue."

K-State officials said they hope to get out of this problem as soon as possible, but no one is really sure how long that might be.

"It took us several years to get in this situation, and it may take us several years to get out," Bosco said.

registration voters can vote in person from 8 a.m. to 7 p.m. and Friday from 8 a.m. to noon Saturday and Monday.

Brad Bryant, state elections director for the secretary of state, speculated that the turnout would be higher than it was in 1998 but lower than 2000. He offered a range of 50 to 60 percent of registered voters might show up to the polls, but he added that a clearer picture would be available Friday.

"Overall, from what we've heard from different counties in the last week or so, there has been fairly heavy advance registration," Bryant said.

As of Wednesday afternoon, Riley County records showed 28,333 registered voters, Campbell said.

But for Nicole Riley, junior in marketing, a lack of political interest has kept her from wanting to vote in the first place.

"I've never voted in my entire life," Riley said.

Riley said the choice to vote is up to the individual, and that voting is not a high priority of hers.

"It's not so much that I don't like either candidate," Riley said.

"But I guess I'm not into the political scene. It's not that important to me now — maybe in the future."

Different venue, same result.

Texas Tech took K-State to the limits once again Wednesday night, but once again the Cats fought off the upset.

K-State (14-6, 10-2) defeated the Red Raiders (8-12, 3-8) in five games in Lubbock, Texas, a match that had an similar feeling to it — like the two teams had gone through the same scenario four weeks prior.

In fact, they had.

On Oct. 2, K-State and Texas Tech played to the wire, with the Wildcats winning in five games. The match was close all the way to the end, but it was K-State's composure that allowed the team to win, Coach Suzie Fritz said.

The same can be said about Wednesday's victory, she said.

"Texas Tech is a great team. Their record is not a reflection of how good that team really is," Fritz said. "But we stayed composed and played well."

K-State's attack was balanced against the Red Raiders, as four players tallied 16 or more kills.

Junior Cari Jensen led the Cats with 19 kills. She now has scored double-digit kills in 11 straight matches.

Middle blocker Lisa Martin was maybe the "X" factor on the night, as she tied a career high with 16 kills on a .480 hitting percentage.

Martin said it was the consistent play of the Cats that allowed them to come back when they were down and fight off Red Raider rallies when they were leading.

"We executed in every aspect of volleyball, not in just one main thing," she said. "We just kept our heads in it."

With the win, K-State wrapped up a perfect month of October, one that saw the team win eight matches.

It was the first time in school history that the Cats had played a perfect month of volleyball.

K-State will begin a new month with hopes of continuing their winning streak when they face Iowa State (10-13, 1-10) on Saturday in Ahearn Field House.

"They have been getting some people," Martin said. "We have to play them as if we were playing Texas Tech or Nebraska and just come out and execute."

Running back Darren Sproles rushes for yards during last week's victory over Baylor. Sproles is averaging 107 yards per game this season.

ON HIS SHOULDERS

Sophomore back in search of 1,000-yard season, improvement

By Sean Purcell
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State's big-time, go-to player this season isn't big at all.

Darren Sproles, all 170 pounds of him, has single-handedly carried the Cat offense at times in 2002.

And although most critics have gotten past the fact that Sproles is not the conventional big back, they continue to be amazed by his production for the Cats this season, Coach Bill Snyder said.

But Snyder said Sproles' importance on this team grows with each carry.

"Obviously, he is a very excellent player," he said.

"What I love about him are his diligent work habits, his toughness. I like his sense of team. I like all of those intrinsic things about him. Of course, you can't take away the real talent in terms of quickness and elusiveness that he has. I think he brings those talents really front and center."

"There are a lot of people that have that talent but don't play as well as Darren does."

And Sproles' talent is easily recognizable — the sophomore is only 141 yards short of becoming K-State's sixth running back to rush for more than 1,000 yards in a season.

Sproles has also rushed for over 120 yards in four consecutive games.

But in last weekend's game against Baylor, Sproles fumbled twice, losing one of them.

Running on all cylinders

K-State's Darren Sproles has now rushed for over 120 yards in four consecutive games. Here is a look at each game.

- Oct. 5 at Colorado 121 yards
- Oct. 12 vs. Okla. St. 130 yards
- Oct. 17 vs. Texas 136 yards
- Oct. 24 at Baylor 124 yards get that part of the game back to where it was, because it's so uncharacteristic of him to put those balls on the ground because he's not a fumbler."

Snyder said he can attribute Sproles' fumbling woes to a desire to score every time he gets the ball.

It's a characteristic he likes of the young back, he said, but one that can be a downfall if Sproles doesn't focus while running.

"There comes a time when you need to get on the ground, and that's hard to convey to a guy that's as competitive as Darren is," Snyder said.

"So the things you love about the man can be a hindrance, but he understands it, and I think he will be very protective in the future."

Sproles echoed Snyder's comments, and said he is committed to making sure he doesn't fumble, because that hurts the team's chances of winning.

"I need to put two hands on the football while I'm in traffic," he said.

Smith said Sproles' attention to these details shows how much he's grown this year.

He said Sproles' focus was just on running last year when he saw limited action behind Josh Scobey.

But now, Smith said, Sproles understands there's more to the game than just running.

"There are some things he did last year that he isn't doing this year because Darren just ran last year. He didn't understand the whole gamut of defenses and things like that," Smith said.

"He got a grasp of that last

"I like his sense of team. Of course you can't take away the real talent in terms of quickness and elusiveness that he has. I think he brings those talents really front and center. There are a lot of people that have that talent but don't play as well as Darren does."

Bill Snyder

year, and that has helped him this year."

That experience last year has also translated into a better mentality about the game, Snyder said.

He said Sproles' work habits off the field equate into production on the field.

"The numbers don't always equate to whether he is doing well or not so well or whether he has improved or not, but I think he's become even a little more of an elusive runner," Snyder said.

"He just doesn't accept where he is. He wants to be better and works diligently to becoming better."

It seems Sproles is OK with having the weight of the K-State offense on his shoulders.

He said that's because he has one goal in mind when he steps on the field each game day — to be a team player.

"I like to win," he said. "I don't want to lose."

High School I Ban on bats begins

Massachusetts could become the first state to ban aluminum baseball bats from postseason high school games, citing injuries from line drives that can fly through the infield at close to 100 mph.

The state Interscholastic Athletic Association today will consider banning the bats from next year's state tournament. It also will decide whether to recommend a ban for all high school games.

No other state bans aluminum bats, according to the National High School Baseball Coaches Association in Arkansas.

NFL | Davis out this week

Washington Redskins running back Stephen Davis' sprained knee will probably keep him out of Sunday's game against the Seattle Seahawks.

Davis, who led the NFC in rushing last year, sprained his knee for the second time this season in Sunday night's 26-21 victory over Indianapolis.

Golf | PGA officials not backing down

PGA Tour commissioner Tim Finchem refused to back down from his position on the Augusta National controversy, saying the tour will recognize the Masters as an official event and he expects his players to compete.

That brought a sharp reply from the National Council of Women's Organizations, whose leader accused Finchem of "stonewalling" on the issue of Augusta's all-male membership.

"If I were his board, I would be asking who he works for: Augusta or the PGA Tour?" Martha Burk said Wednesday. "Clearly, the position he has taken is going to be an apologist for Augusta."

Burk has accused the PGA Tour of creating a double standard by counting the Masters among its official events, even though the tour has a policy not to hold tournaments on courses that discriminate.

Golf | Tour Championship starts today

The start of the PGA Tour season held great promise for Sergio Garcia, Phil Mickelson and anyone else who had designs on winning money, winning tournaments, winning majors and topping Tiger Woods.

At the end of the year, not much has changed.

The Tour Championship, which starts today at East Lake Golf Club, closes the books on a year in which 17 players won for the first time — and Woods again won far more than anyone else.

He already has clinched the money title.

Barring four straight rounds like the British Open Saturday he had at Muirfield (a career-high 81), he'll easily win the Vardon Trophy for lowest scoring average.

Woods already has won five times on tour. No one else has won more than twice.

More than just golf's version of the All-Star game, the Tour Championship is supposed to decide who wins all the awards.

For the fourth straight year, Woods has removed any suspense.

Secondary looking for consistency against Jayhawks

By Joel Reichenberger
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Feast or famine is a rule the K-State secondary has come to live by this season.

No matter what the Wildcat defensive backfield does, it seems to come in lumps.

Several weeks ago, against Oklahoma State, K-State's secondary had a strong day.

Backfield leader Terence Newman saddled Cowboy receiver Rashaun Woods, holding him to only 77 yards, nearly 30 yards under his per-game average. The Cats had four interceptions, setting up two touchdowns.

But last Saturday against Baylor, the Cats found more than a lump. Instead it was more like they hit a speed bump going 100 miles per hour.

"It was just one of those days," defensive coordinator Bob Elliott said.

On that day, a Baylor offense, ranked 93rd in the nation, was able to throw the ball for more than 300 yards against K-State's defense, ranked sixth in the nation.

The Cats' secondary could only watch as Baylor's Reggie Newhouse caught nine passes for 173 yards. In the end, the Baylor quarterbacks were 37-24 for 338 yards and one touchdown.

The Cats hope to remedy the poor performance this weekend when they face off against Kansas, redshirt freshman safety Jesse Tetuan said. The key, he said, is not to place blame or worry about what happened, but rather to focus on hard work.

He said if the Cats can convince themselves they are still a good team, they will play better.

World Series loss to Angels brings out worst in Bonds; Giants outfielder losing fans

The good thing about professional sports is there is always someone worth hating.

The NFL in the early

'90s, it was "America's team" — the disgusting Dallas Cowboys.

Watching the good ol' boy Troy Aikman, "I can't touch Barry Sanders with a 10-foot poll" Emmitt Smith, and Michael "Crack" Where?! Irvin role over the league year after year made me want to puke.

If it weren't for their cheerleaders, the Cowboys would have been out of excuses to exist.

For many years during my childhood, the Cowboys topped the list of teams to hate.

Then came the Yankees. Now, I don't even like baseball that much. I usually could tell you who is good and who is terrible (uh...Kansas City?), and I could probably name off most of the best players around the league, but I am far from a huge fan.

I don't have to be one, though, to hate the Yankees.

Was there a dry eye in the nation last November when Luis Gonzalez dropped in a base hit to deliver the coup-de-grace on the evil Bronx Bombers? I know I shed a happy tear.

Egomaniacs reunite for Halloween show at Mae's

By Adam Lee
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

If your trick-or-drinking brings you to Auntie Mae's Parlor, don't be misled if you notice two of the most realistic Pembertons costumes you've ever seen.

It's no guise - it's just John Evans and Dave Boomer (of the Pembertons) playing in their other band, the Egomaniacs.

Evans (guitar and vocals), Boomer (bass) and Matt Anderson (drums) have been playing emo-core as the Egomaniacs since 1997. The band's first show was on Halloween that year. Evans isn't sure why the band decided to make its debut on the pagan holiday, but he said it just felt like the right thing to do.

"I guess back then it seemed like if you weren't playing a show on Halloween or New Year's Eve, then you weren't really much of a band," Evans said.

The Halloween show has become a signature of the Egomaniacs - they've played on the holiday for five consecutive years since their founding. Last Halloween was the last time the band performed in Manhattan because Anderson moved to Tucson, Ariz.

The crowd at Silverado's jams out to Three Rivers Kennedy on Oct. 10. The band will play with the Egomaniacs tonight at Auntie Mae's Parlor.

Looking for a replacement drummer was never an option. The Egomaniacs continued with their original lineup, deciding not to let a few hundred measly miles interfere with their musical endeavors.

"I think the word 'irreplaceable' sums it up best," Evans said. "In our opinion, a band can't break up until one of the members dies."

Evans and Boomer have continued to collaborate with Anderson by exchanging recordings through the mail. Through swapping tapes and practicing during the times that Evans and Boomer meet up with Anderson, the band feels it has maintained a level of communication that allows a continued progression of its sound.

"It's definitely tough, but it makes the time you do have together much more productive," Evans said. Though they've been busy with the Pembertons, Evans and Boomer remain committed to the Egomaniacs. The band has been busy recording in Chicago for a follow-up to its 2000 release, "Primer," and a summer tour is in the works.

But for right now, band members are content with having some time together and having the chance to play shows. In addition to tonight's show at Mae's, the Egomaniacs will head to the Kansas City area for a gig with Trusty Defiant at the Pyro Room on Friday night.

"We're looking forward to another Halloween show," Boomer said. "It's the greatest holiday, and I can't think of a greater way to celebrate it than rocking out amongst friends."

Shock rockers provide costume inspiration for nu metal fans

By JJ Duncan
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Scary costumes, fake blood and face paint have been around since way before Brian Warner changed his name to Marilyn Manson.

Recent nu metal icons such as Slipknot and Mudvayne and the resurgence of shock rock brought by Rob Zombie may be enough to make some music fans forget that horror has been a part of pop music since the start. Some of the rock stars have become staple Halloween costumes with campy stage makeup and horrific imagery.

Here is a brief history of five of the scariest singers in pop. Sorry, Michael Jackson didn't make the list.

Screamin' Jay Hawkins

This jazz singer made a name for himself starting in the early 1950s.

His bizarre life paralleled his stage show. The singer claimed to be raised by American Indians and he was the father of about 75 children, most of whom he never met, and 36 of them were united by the now defunct www.jayskids.com.

The singer was known for entering a stage adorned with spooky props by coming out of a coffin set on fire and singing his hit single "I Put a Spell On You."

Rock acts such as Black Sabbath and Alice Cooper later borrowed from the singer, and he became a revered icon after he opened for the Rolling Stones in Madison Square Garden in 1980. He died in Paris, France, on Feb. 12, 2000.

Ozzy Osbourne

Black Sabbath laid the foundation for spooky rock 'n' roll, and pretty much single-handedly godfathered metal music.

Ozzy Osbourne has been the enduring icon from the band, making gaudy gothic jewelry, dyed black hair and urban legends about recreational sex and drug use an intrinsic part of dark rock. While Screamin' Jay may have waved around a stick with a skull on it, Ozzy bit the head off a live bat (even if it was on accident) and urinated on the Alamo.

Now that's a shock rocker who has lived like he played.

Glenn Danzig of The Misfits

After finishing his stint in Samhain, Glenn Danzig joined up with these legendary horror-punk rockers, singing songs like "Return of the Fly" and the violent "Last Caress."

The skull-painted faces of the band members were notoriously obscured by their death-spike hair dos, and the costumes were elaborate predecessors for the likes of Gwar. While the band owed its costumes to Kiss, its sound was derived more from goth-punk legends the Damned and Danzig's own Samhain.

For some reason Danzig just doesn't seem as cool solo.

Blackie Lawless of W.A.S.P.

Bass player and vocalist Blackie Lawless was a founding member of W.A.S.P. and still tours with the band.

Lawless was known for wearing a razor-blade jockstrap and dominating elaborate stage shows that involved women being whipped on stage, fire breathing and fake blood. The band's single "Animal (F*** Like A Beast)" was targeted by Tipper Gore's PMRC as porn rock, making the band a mid-'80s household name.

Marilyn Manson

By the time Marilyn Manson put together the Spooky Kids in Florida, shock rock was old hat, and pop music was full of scary rockers to steal from, so he had to hit a new chord.

Say what you will, but Manson succeeded admirably in creating an alternate personality fueled by Saturday morning cartoons, Willy Wonka and bad horror movies. His first album, "Portrait of an American Family," stands as the best example of giving goth metal a mainstream sound while staying creepy as it can get.

Of course after that first album, things just got worse as Manson started to make music for the sole purpose of being confrontational and/or creeping people out. The fun camp and the political messages were both stripped away, and all that was left was a caricature.

Now Manson's spooky image has become an over-used blue print for creepy metal bands. But he does make a good Halloween costume.

Developers plan to honor legends at Motion Picture Hall of Fame

Legends of Hollywood will be honored at a new hall of fame, which will feature exhibits commemorating the industry and movie genres such as comedy, horror and science fiction.

Beginning next summer, the Motion Picture Hall of Fame will annually pick two actors, actresses and films for induction, along with one director, writer, producer and movie composer.

The public will choose inductees from a list of candidates picked by a nominating committee of film critics.

Chicago Botanic Garden buys premier book and journal collection

The Chicago Botanic Garden has purchased one of the world's premier collections of rare botanical books and journals.

The 30-year-old museum park in Glencoe bought 2,219 books and 2,000 horticultural journals from the financially strapped Horticultural Society in Boston.

Both institutions declined to disclose the sale price, but letters filed with the Massachusetts attorney general's office in July put it at about $3 million.

New 'American Idol' judge Angie Martinez drops 'uncomfortable' gig

Rapper Angie Martinez wasn't tough enough to be an "American Idol" judge.

Martinez, who was to join original judges Simon Cowell, Paula Abdul and Randy Jackson for the Fox talent-search show's second season, quit after the first few auditions.

It became "too uncomfortable for me to tell someone else to give up on their dream, especially when I realized that many of them have supported my musical career," Martinez said in a statement.

LISTENING BOOTH

The Collegian wants to know what music you are listening to. If you are passionate about music and want to express your opinion, e-mail A&E Editor JJ Duncan at jduncan\_80@hotmail.com. This week we asked Andy Gough, senior in public relations, what he's playing.

What five albums are you listening to and why?

1. Jimmy Eat World: "Clarity"

It's a well-made, complete album, and the production is phenomenal. They also write songs that people can relate to, and it's a heartfelt album. I think this album is overlooked by most people, and I love that the first track is a slow song, and that's the opposite of what most opening tracks are supposed to be. It makes a statement that they don't have to conform to the common design to be a great band.

2. Midnight Oil: "Capricornia"

I picked up this album after seeing them perform the first track on the Craig Kilborn show. I've been a fan of theirs since "Diesel and Dust," and when I saw them perform, it just blew me away and let me know they were still around.

3. The Band That Saved the World: "Changes"

I know and respect those guys, but they also make great music. I love the funk they play. Nobody does funk anymore, so it's good to hear people play it.

4. Chomsky: "Onward Quirky Soldiers"

They aren't big yet, but they are from the Dallas area, and they sound kind of like Jimmy Eat World, which is a sound I've been into recently. I discovered them on mp3.com, and I think people should watch out for them.

5. Tool: "Lateralus"

I've been a Tool fan for years, and I have to put this on the list. They're a band I could keep listening to and never get tired of hearing them. They have a style different from anyone else, and they are some of the best musicians ever.

DEFENSE | Secondary to focus on limiting mistakes

"We just have to keep on working hard. There's not much, nothing really, we can say," Tetuan said. "(We) just need to focus during practice and not have these mental breakdowns. Just keep on working hard and get this stuff out of our head that we're struggling, and just think that we're a good secondary, and we're going to be coming out ready to play."

Elliott, though, does not need any convincing to see that he still has a talented backfield at his disposal.

So far this season, his defense has intercepted 13 passes, including one in six of eight games, and sacked the quarterback 25 times. He said the secondary has been anything but disappointing this season and figures it will be able to get back to its prior form against KU.

"They just have to play like they're capable of playing, like they have in almost every other game," Elliott said. "It was just not a good day, but they sure played a lot better than that in a lot of the other games that we played. I expect them to get back to playing like that."

One problem K-State has encountered this season is a lack of depth in the secondary. Starting with a shallow backfield at the beginning of the season led to the Cats being that much more handicapped when safeties Bobby Walker and Tetuan went down with injury.

Five of the defensive backs that have seen significant field time this season are still in their first year playing at K-State. Tetuan took over starting duties at safety when Walker suffered an injury against Southern California and further aggravated it against Colorado.

At the other safety position, Rashad Washington is a junior, but spent his first years at K-State working on the offensive side of the ball as a running back.

The secondary also has two new junior college transfers on the squad this season. Randy Jordan holds down the corner-back spot opposite Newman, while James McGill is battling for a starting spot between Walker and Tetuan.

The overall inexperience and lack of depth has played a role, Elliott said. But, he said, there are still ways to work around the weaknesses.

"It's been a problem since the day I got here. The depth in the secondary has never been good, and now, at this point in the season, it's even tougher," he said. "You do the best you can, and you try and do things scheme-wise that maximize your strengths and minimize your weaknesses. That's what you do as a coach, so we're constantly looking for ways to do that."

On Saturday, the Cats could again be short-handed.

Tetuan, who has started the last three games, left the Baylor game with an injury. Against the Bears, he intercepted a pass and returned it 34 yards for a touchdown, but a diving effort for the endzone and the post-play pileup left him a little banged up, he said.

"The guys landed on top of me and just tweaked me up a little bit," Tetuan said.

Nevertheless, he said he hopes to be fully healed and back in action.

"I feel good — I don't know what percentage," Tetuan said. "We're just trying to get it so I can play on Saturday, and see what happens."

COLUMN | Bonds' World Series antic unexcusable

The Yankees only went to about 45 World Series in a row in the late '90s. Then this year they lost to the Angels and all started crying, vowing vengeance next year.

Lord knows George Steinbrenner will drop a small fortune to ensure the outcome. I'm surprised he didn't have Scott Spiezio, Troy Percival and Troy Glaus "disappear" for the great crime of insulting his empire.

Nevertheless, the Yankees have not won a World Series in an amazing two seasons, so even my spite for them has begun to subside.

As I continued to grow up, I started to follow K-State football more and more. Thus, I naturally disliked Nebraska with a passion.

As K-State hopes went up and down, many new teams joined Nebraska on the list. Add Oklahoma because of Bob Stoops, Colorado for being dirty hippies, Notre Dame for Lou Holtz being intolerable, South Carolina for allowing Lou Holtz to move there, Florida State for not putting Bobby Bowden out in the pasture where he belongs, Purdue for the '98 Alamo Bowl and Texas A&M for consistently beating K-State when it knows damn good and well it shouldn't.

But, recently, even those teams have been outclassed when it comes to my dislike list.

Yes, fans, Barry Bonds has taken the cake.

Bonds is a walking, talking public relations disaster. No matter how hard the nation tries to love him, he gives it more reasons to hate him. Bonds is no doubt an amazingly talented athlete who is constantly setting records.

Records like, "The stupidest things ever said in an interview following a World Series loss."

"Back off," he warned. "Or I'll snap!"

Classic. Did he miss that day of kindergarten when we all learned to be nice to others? Now how does he plan on making any friends with that type of attitude?

Bonds is truly an incredible athlete. He can hit a ball farther than nearly anyone else alive, but he is also an enormous bone head.

It isn't like he is the first athlete ever to have to deal with fans and the news media. But did Michael Jordan ever threaten to "snap" on a reporter?

Thank God Bonds doesn't play golf. If he were Tiger Woods, he would probably try and club a reporter with a 9-iron.

Could you imagine if he played John McEnroe in tennis?

Woods, Wayne Gretzky, Jordan, Pete Sampras — the list of respectable champion athletes can go on and on, but it certainly stops at Bonds.

Bonds lost the World Series, and justice was served. Now if only I can find a way to get those no-offense clowns at Notre Dame to understand their place — outside the BCS.

U.S. confronted about draft resolution language that could authorize military force

By Dafna Linzer
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

UNITED NATIONS — The United States was taken to task Wednesday for its draft resolution on Iraq with a majority of Security Council members opposing language, which could authorize Washington to launch a war in Baghdad.

Although the Bush administration has said it expects a swift end to the seven weeks of negotiations, it was clear Wednesday that staunch opposition from powerful players such as Russia, France and China would mean more time, and possibly more compromise, to win support for the draft.

"We have consistently found that we need more time ... than we originally sought," said British Ambassador Jeremy Greenstock, whose country is a co-sponsor of the U.S. draft resolution.

In Washington, Secretary of State Colin Powell said debate would likely be concluded toward the end of next week, but he warned the United States wouldn't be tied to the will of the United Nations.

"There is nothing that we would propose in this resolution or we would find acceptable in a resolution that would handcuff the president of the United States in doing what he feels he must do," Powell said. Powell spent the day on the telephone with Russian, British and French foreign ministers.

The five veto-holding members of the council are deeply split over Iraq. The United States and Britain want the Security Council to approve a resolution threatening Saddam Hussein with retaliation if he fails to comply with a tough new inspections regime.

Russia, France and China want to give Iraq a chance to cooperate before discussing any consequences.

In an effort to lure support, Washington signaled a readiness this week to make some minor concessions involving a new weapons inspection regime.

The suggestions were quietly welcomed but didn't pierce the core of the debate over whether the United States was seeking the authority to act unilaterally if Iraq fails to comply with inspectors.

"Some paragraphs can still be regarded as the right to automatic use of force," Deputy Russian Ambassador Gennady Gatilov said. "This is the main problem."

He said Russia wanted written assurances in the resolution that it will not trigger military action.

Diplomats, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said Washington could be willing to offer such assurances privately. In the meantime, U.S. officials said they were sticking to the draft's basic principles.

Congresswoman urges Gov. Jeb Bush to ask brother to free Haitians

By Alex Veiga
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

MIAMI — A congresswoman pressed Florida Gov. Jeb Bush on Wednesday to ask his brother, the president, to order the release of 200 Haitian immigrants detained after they jumped off a freighter and waded ashore.

The Republican governor was confronted during a campaign stop by Rep. Carrie Meek, D-Fla., who said the Haitians should be treated like Cuban immigrants.

"All you have to do is call — the wet foot-dry foot policy would take effect," Meek said.

Normally, Cuban immigrants are allowed to remain in the United States if they reach land, while those intercepted at sea are returned.

The governor said he agrees Haitian immigrants should be released until their asylum request is heard, like immigrants from other countries.

"Haitians should be treated in the same fashion that Jamaicans, people from the Bahamas, people from any country in the world," Bush said.

A day earlier, the governor said he had called White House officials regarding the immigrants, but he did not elaborate Wednesday as to whether he had spoken with his brother.

White House spokesman Ari Fleischer said the Haitians were being treated fairly and humanely and that the president would not intervene.

"The Immigration and Naturalization Service will apply the law and make the proper judgments," Fleischer said.

The 50-foot wooden freighter carrying 211 Haitians and three Dominicans ran aground Tuesday on a stretch of beach near a road south of downtown Miami. Six Haitian nationals were charged with illegal smuggling in the case.

The Haitian immigrants included 150 men, 35 women and 26 juveniles, INS spokeswoman Barbara Gonzalez said. One of the minors was hospitalized for dehydration.

Gonzalez declined to say whether any of the immigrants had asked for asylum.

The immigrants' detention sparked protests by Haitian-Americans who said U.S. laws discriminate by favoring other immigrants — particularly Cubans.

Jean Robert Lafortune, president of the Haitian-American Grassroots Coalition, said the detention poses a leadership test for Gov. Bush.

"If Bush could champion the issue, he could shift the balance in the election," Lafortune said. "The time for lip service is over."

Bill McBride, Democratic nominee for governor, released a letter to Bush asking him to order the Haitians' release. He also took to Haitian-American airwaves.

"We should not have one set of rules apply to one set of people and one set of rules to apply to Haitians," McBride said during a call Wednesday to WSRF-AM in Fort Lauderdale.

Thousands of Haitians each year risk dangerous voyages aboard rickety, crowded boats to flee their impoverished island. Unlike Cubans, Haitian immigrants usually are denied asylum and sent back.

About 4,000 immigrants have been intercepted at sea this year, including about 1,500 Haitians, the Coast Guard said.

The Bush administration quietly changed its detention policy on Haitian refugees in December to discourage a feared mass exodus. Before the change, Haitian immigrants applying for asylum were released into the community while their petitions were processed. Since the change, Haitians have been kept in immigration custody.

Facilities loses 35 positions

Department's staff size reduced due to state cuts

By Lindsey Tipling
KANSAS STATE COLLEGLIAN

The overall appearance of the school may be at jeopardy as K-State is hit with budget cuts.

Ed Rice, associate vice president of the Division of Facilities, said facilities is experiencing just as much of a cutback in spending as the rest of campus.

"We're cutting back on the number of people," he said. "When people resign or leave, we are just not replacing them."

Rice said facilities has decreased its staff by 35 people this semester.

"Half of the people we have lost this semester have been custodians," he said. "We have a very high turnover rate there."

Rice said the difficulty for the department is trying to get everything that needs to be done accomplished.

"We are doing as much work as before with less people," he said. "And we are not asking people to work later or longer shifts."

Rice said facilities officials are prioritizing what things are done first and what things can be left for a later date.

"We are concentrating on areas of health concern, like re-

Counseling Services fee raised

Senate votes for 2-percent increase

Edie Hall
KANSAS STATE COLLEGLIAN

Student senators passed a bill that would increase the University Counseling Services privilege fee by 2 percent each year during the next three years at their meeting Thursday night.

The bill was amended to give the 2-percent increase rather than a 1-percent increase. This amounts to an additional 50 cents in fees per student each semester, Travis Stryker, privilege committee chair, said.

Student Body President Zac Cook debated the bill saying that despite other K-State employee salaries remaining constant for the 2002-03 year, there were pay increases in some positions at Counseling Services.

Cook said that if Counseling Services could give pay raises to employees when other offices couldn't, they didn't need the extra money as much as it appeared.

Fred Newton, director of Counseling Services, said Counseling Services was able to take the extra money by eliminating a position and giving other staff pay raises.

He said that because of differential salary increases, other professors had received pay raises and Counseling Services employees had not.

Hayley Urkevich, business administration senator, said the staff still was paid 10 percent less than people in similar positions outside of K-State.

Sniper link found

Suspects' rifle connected to more killings

By Melinda Deslatte
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BATON ROUGE, La. — Authorities charged the two sniper suspects with murder Thursday in a Louisiana attack that came just two days after a similar slaying in Alabama.

John Lee Muhammad, 41, and John Lee Malvo, 17, are now charged with a month-long series of killings stretching from the Gulf Coast to the suburbs around the nation's capital.

Police nationwide are said to be looking for links to the two men, assisted by federal authorities.

The two men face multiple state and federal counts in the Alabama and Louisiana cases and the sniper spree that left 10 people dead and three others wounded in Maryland, Virginia and Washington, D.C. They are also suspects in a February killing in Washington state.

Baton Rouge Police Chief Pat Englade issued first-degree murder warrants for Muhammad and Malvo after ballistics tests matched the rifle used in the sniper shootings to the Sept. 23 slaying and robbery of a beauty shop worker in the Louisiana capital.

Hong Im Ballenger, 45, died from a single shot to the head as she left work. Witnesses said the gunman was a young black man who fled into a nearby park and evaded bloodhounds called in to track him down.

According to the arrest warrant, police believe Muhammad shot the woman and Malvo stole her purse and fled.

Earlier in the day, Alabama authorities said the same rifle, a .223-caliber Bushmaster, had been linked to the shooting death of a liquor store worker in Montgomery on Sept. 21, two days before the Louisiana slaying and 315 miles away.

In that case, the suspect — allegedly Malvo — was seen rifling through one of the victim's purses when he was chased off by an arriving police officer.

The sniper suspects have been in custody in Maryland since they were captured at a highway rest stop Oct. 24. Authorities found the rifle in their car, which they say was modified so someone could fire unseen through a hole in the trunk.

Custodial staff spends long hours cleaning campus

By Amy Preston
KANSAS STATE COLLEGLIAN

Each day, hours before students and faculty members arrive to class, the "imaginary people" of K-State are busy at work.

They come to work before the sun rises and leave in the afternoon hours, going unnoticed. Some also work late at night, long after students have left.

However, their work affects every individual who steps foot on campus.

These individuals make up the custodial services of K-State, and here's their story.

6 a.m. Kathy Reed, a custodial specialist of 18 years, arrives to work. In charge of Ward, Leasure and Durland halls, she starts her morning by cleaning all of the classrooms in each building before students arrive for class.

Day in the life of

The "Day in the Life Of" series will focus on people and their jobs, giving students a look into a daily life different from their own. A Collegian reporter will shadow the individual and tell his or her story.

In order to prepare each classroom, Reed must clean all chalkboards and whiteboards, then sweep the floors and pick up all of the trash. Depending on the amount of work, Reed said one lecture hall alone could take up to an hour to clean.

Reed, along with other specialists in her crew, said they have one pet peeve in the classrooms — excess trash left by students.

"There are trash cans in the classrooms," she said. "The big lecture halls are a mess because they leave their old newspapers and trash everywhere."

After her work in the classrooms, Reed shifts her focus to the bathrooms, where she makes sure they are ready for the day ahead. In the bathrooms, Reed cleans, mops and stocks the necessary toiletries for the day.

8:00 a.m. By the time some students arrive to their first classes, Reed and her fellow custodial workers are ready for their first break of the day. Resting only for 15 minutes, the crew has the chance to catch up and plan for the remainder of the morning.

8:15 a.m. Quentin Rawlins, custodial manager, goes around to 14 different buildings, overseeing the work done by his crew members and assisting them where help is needed.

Files of past tests used by greek organizations

By Rogie Dorpinghaus
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Kristine Sheedy is the scholarship chair of Kappa Alpha Theta sorority, and a part of her job is to keep test files current for members of her sorority.

Test files include copies of old tests and answer sheets that are used to help students study for exams.

Several greek organizations keep test files.

"I think people probably exchanged test files anyways," Sheedy, junior in industrial engineering, said. "It's just easier to have one central place for everyone to look. It works out for everyone."

Jennifer Samayoa, member of Theta and a junior in marketing, said that while Theta's test files are for members of the chapter, non-members can gain access through a member sharing them.

"I've shared them before," Samayoa said. "It's up to the members if they want to share the tests with other people in their classes."

Brandon Van Allen, the scholarship chairman of Alpha Gamma Rho fraternity and sophomore in agronomy, said test files are helpful study guides.

"For the most part, the guys here use them to get an idea of the type of tests the teacher gives," he said.

Test files are not limited to greek organizations. Any group of students could create a test file of their own.

However, Mishelle Banas, residence life coordinator at Goodnow Hall, said Goodnow no longer uses test files.

"I couldn't speak on behalf of other residence halls, but I think that's the policy across the board. So I would assume that no residence halls use them," Banas said.

Students in other residence halls said they hadn't seen or heard of test files being used in their respective halls.

"I've never heard of anything like that within the residence halls," said Julia Haney, sophomore in financial services and social coordinator for the Association of Residence Halls.

Nick Potenski, sophomore in computer engineering and resident of Marlatt Hall, said he didn't know of the use of test files in Marlatt, either.

Helene Marcoux, associate director of the Honor Council provost office, said that when she was working on her doctoral degree, she surveyed 368 faculty in spring 2000.

One thing the survey asked was if faculty believed the use of test files in greek organizations was cheating.

She said about 79 percent of the faculty did not believe the use of test files was cheating.

Survey-takers made extra comments regarding test files such as "depends on faculty stipulation" and "depends on whether the teacher who gave the test allowed students to keep the tests."

"I believe if an instructor has old test files in the library where everyone can access them, then that's OK," Marcoux said. "However, if a single mom who is the first generation going to college of her family and is not in a sorority, she's going to be at a disadvantage."

"Yes, test files are legal, but are they fair?"

Phil Anderson, honor system director, said that if a student wanted to use test files, they should ask their instructors to avoid being in violation of the honor pledge.

Anderson said a student is required to attend a hearing and can be expelled from the university after two honor pledge violations.

He said that how the tests are accumulated could be a factor of whether it is a violation of the honor code.

"Study guides can be useful, but to be on the safe side, students should check with the instructor to be sure it is an authorized activity. In most cases, it probably will be," Anderson said.

Women comprise 12 percent of KSU engineering population

Program encourages female students to play larger part in college

By Amy Link
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Boys' club. College of Engineering.

Some may think these two are one in the same.

As female engineering majors, Trisha Culbertson, Erin Pasold and Jennifer Beach have become accustomed to being the minority in their major.

"I was expecting it (being a minority), especially in electrical engineering," Beach, junior in electrical engineering, said.

Suzanne Franks, director of the Women in Engineering and Science Program, said the College of Engineering student enrollment is about 12 percent female. This is below the national average of 19 percent, Franks said.

Franks said there are a number of reasons why K-State is below average, and the university has begun to address the issue.

She said the mission of the Women in Engineering and Science Program is to increase the enrollment of women of all ethnic backgrounds. Still, Franks said the program was not developed because female engineers needed special help.

"Women don't need special help. They have the talent and the capability to complete the program," she said. "While other areas — law, medicine, veterinary — have increased their female numbers in the last 20 years, engineering has not. The fact we have this program says more about engineering than about women."

Although it is in a similar situation, the College of Architecture does not have a women's program. Maureen Herspring, academic adviser for architecture, said that while two-thirds of students in the college are male, college officials never have considered it a problem.

"We have had surveys asking students if we need a special program for women, and it has got shot down every time," Herspring said. "Women don't want to have a separate support group — they feel a part of the whole."

Although females enrolled in the College of Engineering feel accepted by their peers, the problem is not in acceptance but in numbers, Franks said.

Franks said there are not enough female students in the college, and that lacks diversity as well.

She said many people don't have an understanding of what engineers do, and therefore, most students who enroll have been informed by family members.

Culbertson, sophomore in biological and agricultural engineering, said she had an aunt who was an engineer who helped her choose a major.

"She was a big influence in my decision. I learned about engineering from her," Culbertson said.

Pasold and Beach also had family members who served as role models in their career choices.

Franks said that because of these types of influences, or role models, the College of Engineering only attracts a certain demographic.

To combat this problem, the Women in Engineering and Science Program, with corporate and government funding, has organized events for middle school girls and female high school students to come to K-State in the summer and learn about science, Franks said.

Another possibility for increasing enrollment of female students of all ethnicities could be to increase the number of female professors.

Franks said that in fall 2001, only seven engineering professors were female, and only one female professor was a racial minority.

Of these seven, all were assistant or associate professors.

Franks said university officials are aware of the problem and are trying to increase these numbers. There is administrative support for this increase, she said.

Franks said increasing the number of female professors will not create the same increase in female enrollment, but it should help narrow the gender gap.

For now, female students will be left to deal with being the minority, which Pasold, junior in architectural engineering, said is not always a bad thing.

Pasold said she has a class where she is the only female. She has not experienced any discrimination, but there is still a challenge.

"I think there is an unwritten challenge in the air — like 'We know you're suppose to be here, but now prove it.' But it's a fun challenge," she said.

Lindsay,

Every day I spend with you is a precious gift from God. You are my source of inspiration and everyday you motivate me to become a better person than I was yesterday. Thank you for loving me for who I am and for seeing the man that I could become. You are the most beautiful person I have ever met, both inside and out. I hope that someday I can make you realize how much you mean to me. You are my every one and everything. Thank you for showing me what it means to be truly happy. I love you

Jonathan

Happy Anniversary

Lindsay Drosselmeyer

To say we fell in love at first sight
Would be like saying that Oct. 19 was just a night,
Who would of thought that one look could have such an impact on a life,
I've never met another that I could envision as my wife.

To say our love was simply love,
Would be like saying that heaven was just a place above,
Never before have I felt something so strong,
Together forever is how we belong.

To say the day starts and ends with the moon and the sun would be untrue,
Because my days start and will end with you
I still remember the first time the "L" word came about,
That late night at Dillon's is a memory I couldn't live without.

As November 2 approaches, our three-year anniversary is in the air,
I could spend the rest of my life trying to show you just how much I care,
There aren't enough hours in the day for me to let you know each and every day
That I love you, ineffably, more than words can say.

TO THE POINT Test files legal, helpful way to study for exams

Test files, or compiled copies of old tests and answer sheets, are useful studying tools for tough exams.

And honor system officials say they're perfectly legal.

Several greek houses on campus use test files to help their members learn material for tests.

But this system is not limited to greek organizations. Any student can create test files of their own.

This would be especially useful in residence halls.

Resident assistants or hall coordinators could compile tests and answer keys and keep them on file for future occupants.

However, complaints are likely to surface about test files giving some students an unfair advantage over others.

If instructors are worried about some students having an edge over others, they should do a better job of keeping their tests in the classroom, such as pick them up when students are finished. Or, professors can provide old tests online as study tools for students.

Test files don't pose an unfair advantage. Anyone can create these files.

If you're upset at the possibility of someone knowing what exactly to focus on, set up test files for future students.

If you aren't able to take advantage, someone else can in the future.

MOTHER KNOWS BEST

Modern females considering new, distinctive roles when planning future

I loved calling home my freshman year of college.

I would pitifully whine about school, and my mother would tell me about the antics of my little brother and sister and the progress of her garden.

Times have changed.

Now I am in my junior year, and I still call home once a week to hash out my frustrations of being a working student. However, instead of feeling better, I feel like a loser.

That is because my mother got a full-time job, went back to school and still has my little brother and sister at home. What do I have to complain about?

The portrayal of the nuclear family as the father who works 8 to 5 and the mother who finds her housekeeping duties fulfilling is fading fast.

Now, we have latchkey kids and children who are raised on microwave dinners and hectic schedules. Mom is no longer there to find the special pair of socks you wanted to wear on Wednesday. Children's responsibilities increase with the mother's working outside the home, and husbands no longer can depend on their wives to have supper on the table at 6 p.m. sharp.

What happened to "Leave it to Beaver"?

Divorce and children born out of wedlock began to change the face of the "average" American family beginning in the 1970s. According to the U.S. Census Bureau Public Information office's Web site, www.singleparent.com, the number of divorces between 1970 and 1996 quadrupled.

KATHRYN

This trend forced women into the work force to help support broken families. With little education and lower pay rates for women than men, this left many homes below the poverty line with the woman as head of household.

Women began to strive for more.

With traditional values changing and the roles of men and women interchangeable, women today look at their futures with different perspectives than their mothers and grandmothers had. If we were in the 1950s state of mind, our future plans would include these:

1. attending school until we meet a decent man
2. getting married
3. having kids
4. raising children and supporting our husband's endeavors in the work force
5. waiting for grandchildren

Women today have a much different outlook. Now, we are focused on finishing college, establishing a career and maybe getting married, if we have time.

Jackie Spears, director of the K-State women's study program, says universities are now more than 50 percent female. Let's face it — women have realized that depending on a man to take care of them is a precarious life plan.

These are the facts, and we have to accept that society has changed drastically in the last 50 years. However, we cannot ignore the substantial role the stay-at-home mother has in society.

As a child and adolescent, I would have been scared to come home to an empty house. My mom was always there when I got home to ask me how my day was. At the time, it was financially feasible for her to stay home and take care of the house and children while my dad went off to work.

That was a full-time career in and of itself.

My mother has been calm under the greatest pressures. With six children, she has seen blood, dealt with heartbreak and worked endlessly to instill values in her children.

Women are born to be nurturers, and it is an extraordinary opportunity to be able to stay at home and raise children. Call me old-fashioned, but I hope one day I am given the opportunity to be a stay-at-home mom.

But I also want the best of both worlds. I hope to go back to my career when my children are old enough to attend school. We are in a new time — it is possible to have it all if you work hard enough.

Aspiring to be a stay-at-home mom deserves respect, even if the times are changing.

War on terror grinds to halt as attention shifts toward Iraqi conflict

On Sept. 20, 2001, at 8 p.m., President George W. Bush addressed Congress and all of America.

That night, he explained the government's actions in the aftermath of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

That night, he promised a "war on terrorism."

It's been nearly a year since Operation Enduring Freedom achieved its objectives. Almost a year later, it is prudent to ask why Bush has not tasked the military to duplicate the effort in other nations.

The worthiness of attacking Iraq is a different argument, but Bush's obsession with Saddam Hussein is a thorn that has punctured the terror war's tires.

To effectively criticize Bush's actions, it's important to examine the promises he made to us. To be fair, I will acknowledge that some of the goals have been met. There remain many more unfulfilled.

In his speech, Bush said, "Our response involves far more than instant retaliation and isolated strikes. Americans should not expect one battle, but a lengthy campaign, unlike any other we have ever seen."

We have seen action in only one theater: Afghanistan. With the diversion provided by Iraq, the campaign looks to become too lengthy to measure.

ANDREW LAWSON

Bush goes on to say that, "It may include dramatic strikes, visible on TV, and covert operations, secret even in success."

CNN has given us plenty to work with in this area.

Continuing, Bush states, "We will starve terrorists of funding, turn them against another, drive them from place to place, until there is no refuge or rest."

According to whitehouse.gov, 208 countries have pledged to do this. Of those, 167 have seized terrorist assets worth $77.9 million — an additional $34.3 million frozen by America itself — and the rest are working with the United States to improve their abilities to do the same.

Bush continued, "And we will pursue nations that provide aid or safe haven to terrorism. Every nation, in every region, now has a decision to make. Either you are with us, or you are with the terrorists. From this day forward, any nation that continues to harbor or support terrorism will be regarded by the United States as a hostile regime."

Now we get to the heart of the matter. There are countries against which, to date, we have taken little or no action.

Palestinian terrorists in Israel are an example of a group Bush claimed to oppose, but there is great sentiment in America toward them. There is also plenty of criticism of the Israeli government for its attempts to put down terrorism, attempts that parallel U.S. actions in Afghanistan.

Last week, Chechen rebels took more than 800 hostages in a Moscow theater. A Russian effort to incapacitate the terrorists with a nerve gas resulted in the death of more than 110 hostages. Chechnya has been fighting for its independence for years now, and it is believed al-Qaeda has secretly supported them in that conflict.

Recent al-Qaeda operations include the attack on a French tanker Oct. 6 in Yemen, which was strikingly similar to that on the U.S.S. Cole two years ago in the same waters, the attack on American servicemen Oct. 8 in Kuwait and the Bali night-club bombings Oct. 12 in Indonesia.

Though covert actions might be taking place now, it's unlikely any headway can be made against terrorism without a military effort, such as Operation Anaconda.

Instead of sending soldiers to Iraq, Bush should devote the military to rooting out terrorists for good.

CUSTODIAL | Long hours spent behind scenes

"I oversee that work is accomplished and that it's getting done," he said. "I also assist in some cleaning."

For the rest of the morning, crew members focus on picking up offices, cleaning entrances and hallways, and generally picking up throughout the buildings.

11 a.m. Lunchtime. For Reed, lunch is 30 minutes.

11:30 a.m. - noon Because of their early lunchtime, crew members take advantage of faculty members' lunch breaks and clean their offices while they're gone. Most of the time, Reed said, she will vacuum in the offices and tidy things before they return.

12:30 p.m. This week, the custodial crew spent a large amount of the afternoon time in Ackert Hall, cleaning up the new addition on the second floor.

Custodial specialists Ed Kleiner and Joseph Roberts, along with four other crew members, begin cleaning and waxing the new tile floors, a process that takes anywhere from 15 minutes to an hour, depending on the space.

Rawlins said this special project will be finished in two weeks, with the hard work from his crew.

"This is a good crew," he said. "We're already ahead of schedule."

1 p.m. Break time. For the second break of the day, workers gather all their supplies and move them to the storage room. Then, they head to the lounge, where they relax for 15 minutes.

However, Roberts decides to clean vacuums in Ackert's storage closet during break.

"I'll just take one later," he said. "This needs to get done."

1:15 p.m. All custodial workers in the crew return back to work.

At this time, Reed said she usually touches up around the buildings and makes her final cleaning rounds before her shift ends.

However, due to a shortage of workers, the afternoon is instead spent finishing the special floor project at Ackert Hall.

"This crew is working three-short, which means there are three positions that are not filled within this crew," Rawlins said.

Therefore, tasks such as window cleaning and extra trash pick-up will have to wait until the next morning.

2:30 p.m. For a majority of the custodial crew, the shift is over. Reed and Kleiner clock out, only to go to another job in an hour. Reed spends her evenings cleaning for the Manhattan-Ogden School District, while Kleiner goes to work at Dillons Food Store.

The days are long, but crew members said they enjoy their jobs.

"You get to meet new people and have a lot of new friends," Roberts said.

"You're never put in the same situation working here."

"The working environment is really nice," Kleiner said. "A lot of the teachers and graduate students that you get to know treat you like you're family."

Bush committed to end Israeli occupation

By Barry Schweid
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — While keeping arm's length from Israel's political turmoil, the Bush administration renewed its commitment Thursday to ending Israel's "occupation" of the West Bank and Gaza and seeking establishment of a Palestinian state in 2005.

The goals are contained in a peacemaking "roadmap" approved by the United Nations, the European Union and Russia.

American diplomats are in the Mideast even amid uncertainty about the United States' plans to go to war with Iraq.

German Foreign Minister Joschka Fischer, declaring his country Israel's best friend in Europe, endorsed the diplomatic effort and the goal.

Fischer, in a breakfast meeting with reporters, disputed the notion that the Bush administration was not playing an active role.

Israel's prime minister, Ariel Sharon, has endorsed statehood for the Palestinians, but in a gradual way.

It's tough to be a Jayhawk

Kansas football not living up to rivalry status

CHRIS SHANK

K-State's rise to prominence under Coach Bill Snyder has been tabbed as a "blueprint for success."

The same cannot be said when talking about the university just 80 miles east of Manhattan.

Competing column

Daily Kansan sports columnist, Andy Samuelson, has his own opinion on this weekend's Sunflower Showdown. Read it at www.kstatecollegian.com.

rate ways. The Cats have safely controlled every Governor's Cup game since 1993. In the last decade of dominance, K-State has outscored KU 354-91.

There haven't been many hotly contested games as of late. But the last couple of years have been enjoyable to watch, with the Jayhawk program self-destructing.

Here are some of the highlights.

Who can forget hapless Zac Wegner? On the second possession of the 1998 game, he was knocked out for the season by a lethal hit served up simultaneously by former defensive players Jeff Kelly and Travis Litton.

The defense found another Jayhawk signal-caller in their last trip to Lawrence in 2000. On his first possession, quarterback Dylon Smith was strung up by former Wildcat defensive end Chris Johnson, forcing Smith to fumble and knocking KU's starting QB out of the game for two series.

The list of pathetic quarterbacks to don the crimson and blue and come away empty against the Cats during the last decade is long and lengthy. The likes of Jay Alexander, Matt Johnner and Mario Kinsey join Wegner and Smith as those who where destroyed by K-State while at the helm of the Jayhawk ship.

Ah, and who can forget Chalupagate. A few weeks before the end of the 1999 season, KU's senior defensive end, Dion Rayford, pulled into the drive-thru of a Taco Bell in Lawrence wanting some food. After ordering, Rayford attempted to jump through the drive-thru window and got stuck doing so, looking for some free tasty treats.

The stunned and scared employees called the police and Rayford was arrested.

I heard he was angry that an employee accused him of playing football for KU.

Arrests dealing with cheap chow don't just end there for the "Flaw on the Kaw." Former starting quarterback Kinsey, along with tailback Reggie Duncan stole a purse from a KU female student. Then Kinsey and Duncan attempted to order a pizza with the poor girl's credit card and were surprised to get arrested for the crime.

The coaches have not done much better at looking intelligent. Take for example Terry Allen, former KU head coach and town crier. Allen in 2000 proclaimed he believed KU had closed the talent gap with the Cats.

Later that week, a Jonathan Beasley-led K-State squad slaughtered the Jayhawks 52-13.

Coach Mark Mangino tries to compare himself and his situation to Snyder's when he

Snyder, Mangino reunite in Lawrence

By Sean Purcell
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State has had a strong-hold on the Governor's Cup for nine seasons.

And while the Sunflower Showdown hasn't been close since 1994, there is an added variable to the equation this year.

KU's coach, Mark Mangino, was once a student of Bill Snyder's.

Mangino came to K-State in 1991, and K-State had its first winning season since 1982.

Despite being relatively inexperienced, Snyder said there wasn't really any concern when he hired Mangino.

"The experience issue hasn't always been a factor," he said. "Mark, the feedback I got, was a hard worker, an intelligent guy that did things the right way and I thought would fit in with a staff that wanted to roll its sleeves up and go to work."

K-State did go to work, appearing in six bowl games in the time Mangino was a Wildcat assistant coach.

After the 1998 season, Mangino, along with several other K-State coaches, went

Word on Terry

Wide-receiver James Terry, who missed the Baylor game due to an injury, but is probable for Saturday's game against KU.

"He will practice this afternoon (Tuesday) so we think he will be prepared to play," Coach Bill Snyder said.

to Oklahoma to try to do the same thing they had helped Snyder do in Manhattan. They did.

Mangino was part of the national championship team at OU in 2000, stayed at Oklahoma one more season, then took the coaching job at Kansas.

Now he's once again attempting to rebuild a program in the same conference as K-State.

Snyder said that's a concern going into this weekend's match-up.

"Like I have said before, I wish apples would fall a little further from the tree," he said. "It's not just Mark. There are other coaches over there that have been on our staff and have a good understanding about what we are all about. It puts you in a position where you have to make some changes and we have made changes that have date back to a period of time when coaches left to Oklahoma."

Changes have been made, linebacker Terry Pierce said, and will continue to be made now that the Cats will face a former coach every year.

Although the majority of alterations have been made on offense, the defense will change things up a little bit this weekend as well, he said.

"I think we will change things enough to where they won't be able to get a read on what we are doing," Pierce said.

Pierce said with Mangino at KU, it just adds a little more spice to this rivalry.

He said although K-State has handled the Jayhawks with ease for nearly a decade, anything can happen in games like these.

"In rivalry games, I think everything is always evened out," Pierce said. "It's almost like Oklahoma State and Oklahoma last year. Oklahoma was a much better team but in a rivalry game there are a lot of different emotions, more so than just schemes and football."

Running backs coach Michael Smith said the game against KU is the highlight of his season because of the close proximity of the schools.

Smith, who played at K-State from 1988 to 1991 and has served as a coach since 1995, said it was a great feeling when the Cats finally beat the Jayhawks in 1991. Now, even though the Cats have dominated for several years, the feeling is still the same when K-State wins.

"I don't think it's changed too much," Smith said.

"It's still KU/K-State."

Cats look to continue sack success against KU

By Joel Reichenberger
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In the past nine meetings between K-State and Kansas, scores have varied, names have changed and KU's coaches have come and gone, but the Wildcats have always gone away with the win.

The outcome, though, isn't the only thing that has remained the same.

K-State has used a vicious pass rush and monster hits to unseat the Jayhawks, particularly in the last several years.

In 2000, on only the third Jayhawk offensive play, Wildcats Chris Johnson and Mario Fatafehi met in the Kansas backfield. Johnson recorded the sack on Dylon Smith, and Fatafehi recovered the fumble and coasted into the end zone.

In that game, the Cats sacked the KU signal caller a team-record nine times.

It isn't the only instance of K-State's pass rush setting records, either. In fact, K-State has virtually rewritten its sack-record books with the pummeling of KU quarterbacks.

In 1995, the Cats recorded eight sacks on the way to upsetting the No. 6 Hawks 41-7. The mark set a KSU Stadium record. Wildcat defensive end Nyle Wiren nabbed the quarterback three times, which ties for second on the single-game individual sack list.

Coming off a week where this year's unit put up impressive numbers of its own — eight sacks against Baylor —

K-State linebacker Bryan Hickman grabs Baylor quarterback Josh Zachry's jersey during K-State's game in Waco, Texas, last Saturday. The Cats travel to Lawrence this weekend to play KU.

K-State's newest corps of quarterback killers is salivating at the chance to make a difference Saturday. Defensive coordinator Bob Elliott said keeping steady pressure on the KU quarterback will be important.

"That is important in every game. We got to rush the passer whether it's four guys, or five or six," he said. "We can't just always blitz, and our guys are capable of putting on good rush with just four."

KU might be due for a big sack day as well. The Jayhawks have given up 28 sacks in nine games, an average of more than three sacks a game.

Plus, the Jayhawks' regular starting quarterback, Bill Whittemore, might not play Saturday. Whittemore sustained an injury to his left knee on the third quarter of KU's contest against Missouri and is questionable for Saturday's contest.

All the better, K-State linebacker Terry Pierce said. He said the less experience a quarterback has the better, and he said he hopes his defense will have a chance to tee off on a quarterback that is still uncomfortable with the position.

"As a defense, you always get hyped

One Sad Monkey returns from Chicago to perform tonight at Dave's Hideaway

By J. Scott Bowman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A band often takes its music seriously, even if its goal is to try to make people laugh.

One Sad Monkey, notorious for its comedic rock shows, moved to Chicago after graduating from K-State in May and has been trying to take its music career a little more seriously. They will be back in town playing at Dave's Hideaway tonight.

Guitarists Chance Mullin and Tyler Lansdown created One Sad Monkey two and a half years ago when they started with an improv gig. They started to play in bars and continued to play until they left Manhattan.

The band moved to Chicago after graduation and has been scaling back, concentrating on doing more serious songs, Lansdown said. However, they still like to play the old funny songs as well.

They play an acoustic rock set, and their musical influences include the Counting Crows, Barenaked Ladies and Tenacious D. This is what Lansdown had to say about coming back to Manhattan:

Q: What have you guys been up to since graduating from K-State and moving to Chicago?

A: We graduated in theater, and we've been looking for some acting gigs, but we've been working on the band. There are so many places to play up here, and we've played at a lot of them.

We started out doing a lot of open mic nights, and then we started to play a few bars which was neat. We got a gig at a place called Sophia's, which is cool because we got paid to do it.

We've been having a lot of fun, which is cool because Chicago is such an intimidating place to play. We've been working on trying to make One Sad Monkey an entity in Chicago.

Q: What is the history of your previous band "Devil's Dominion" and how does it pertain to One Sad Monkey?

A: A long time ago, when we were in theater, we talked about death metal bands and figured that maybe we should start one. We played mainly during Halloween and on special occasions.

We really sucked, but we knew how to rock out. We had about 10 songs and just kind of played around. Pomeroy would invite us up on stage and we'd play some. After the shows, it was funny hearing people say how we rocked, when we really weren't much of a death metal band.

Devil's Dominion really has nothing at all to do with One Sad Monkey, besides the fact that we played in it and it was fun.

Rumor has it that all of the Devil's Dominion members will be in town Halloween night, but we won't necessarily play. Devil's Dominion was a bright star that just happened to fade too soon.

Q: What can people expect to see at your show?

A: We have a lot of fun playing music and I think the audience has a good time as well. Lately, Chance and I have been connecting really well. We've had a lot of drive and we're excited to play. We've written a lot of new songs that we're going to try out and we've been pumped to play in Manhattan for months.

Q: If you could compare yourself to another artist, who would it be?

A: It's kind of hard for me to say, but everyone tells us that we sound a lot like the Barenaked Ladies mixed with a little Tenacious D.

I don't know how accurate that is, but we're thrilled to be compared to them. Besides, you can't argue with what everyone else is saying about you.

IN BRIEF

The Associated Press

Record executive funds university degree in recording

Record executive Clive Davis has donated $5 million to create a department of recorded music at New York University's Tisch School of the Arts.

Thanks to Davis, who graduated from NYU, the Tisch School said Wednesday it will create the first degree in the country that focuses on record producing as an artistic discipline.

The Clive Davis Department of Recorded Music will offer a four-year undergraduate program that educates students in all aspects of contemporary recorded music.

"Clive Davis has acquired a legendary reputation for spotting and developing new musical talent in the course of his 35 years in the recording industry," said Mary Schmidt Campbell, dean of the Tisch School. "His inspired leadership and golden ear have changed the business of contemporary music forever."

Taste of bayou comes to Manhattan

By Adam Lee
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Mike West is an Australian-born singer/songwriter who moved to New Orleans 10 years ago to immerse himself in the culture and music that he loves.

His unique style of music, which he calls New Orleans Levee-Billy, has been widely praised by critics and other musicians. In addition to eight of his own albums, West has collaborated with a handful of artists including Shawn Mullins, the Jeff and Vida Band, and Kirk Rundstrum.

West plays more than 300 nights a year, from the French Quarter to Holland and everywhere in between. On Saturday night, West will be at Auntie Mae's Parlor to share his songs of the South.

Q: The banjo can't be too popular of an instrument in Australia. How did you get introduced to it, and why did you decide to play it?

A: I used to play for change in the underground stations in England. I was a terrible guitar player. I'd sit there and everyone would ignore me. Then, one time in London, I heard a guy playing the banjo, and it just sounded fantastic in the tubes, ringing and reverberating. But I never knew anyone that had one.

Tune in

Then, when I was 30, my wife had a friend who had a banjo but didn't know how to play it. He was like, "If I lend you the banjo and you learn how to play it, will you teach me?" So he lent me the banjo, and I just fell in love with it.

Q: How does one go about writing a New Orleans Levee-Billy song?

A: A lot of my material just comes from anecdotes and stories that have been told to me. A lot of them are stories from down here. People that have lived here a long time tell me things.

It just seems like the stories are filled with poetry and truth. That provides a lot of inspiration for me.

Q: The South is a pretty complicated place, a lot of people can live there their entire lives and not understand it. Your music seems to offer a very thorough and credible portrait of the South. How did you get such a firm grasp of the culture and the issues facing the region?

A: New Orleans is a port city, and it's used to an influx of people. The people here have been so good to me and open to me, letting me have a place in their lives, even as an immigrant.

It's really the place that I've felt the most at home out of anywhere I've ever lived. I don't know why that is, really. It is a complicated place. I don't think that I can kid myself by saying that I really understand it. But that's what's fascinating about it, it's full of contradiction.

The stereotypes are completely confounding and inaccurate. That complication and contradiction finds a way into my music. I like for a song to have an apparent meaning, and then if you want to dig a little deeper, there's another layer. People just talk like that down here. They'll say one thing, but really it'll have another meaning.

Musician to join jazz series

Nebraska artist to play in 3rd Swing City show; relaxed venue perfect for mellow style, tones

By J. Scott Bowman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Jazz music is about interpretation, and that is what trumpet player Darryl White likes about it.

The Manhattan Arts Center will be host to the third Swing City Jazz concert of the semester Saturday. The featured artist is Darryl White, assistant professor of the school of music at the University of Nebraska.

The local jazz series has gained the reputation of a venue for serious music enthusiasts, which is why White is excited to play.

"I really enjoy playing venues where people are there to listen," he said.

"If I'm at a place where the clinking of the glasses is louder than the music, it's not for me."

White will be accompanied by pianist Tom Harvill, drummer Kurt Gartner, bassist Steve Rigazzi and local jazz guitarist Wayne Goins, K-State director of jazz.

Saturday will be the first time White has played in the series.

He has played throughout the Midwest, including the Blue Room in Kansas City, Mo.

White said his musical influences include classical music, jazz musicians like Miles Davis, and modern hip-hop.

He has released two solo recordings including the 2002 release "In the Fullness of Time."

"It will be a fun concert, because I'm sure a lot of people in Manhattan haven't heard me play," he said.

"But, with jazz, each musician brings something different to the stage. We all have our own interpretations, and we all have different ways to play as individuals."

Vendors give tips for winter unions

Dress styles, colors vary according to change in seasons

By Pete Elssasser
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The snowflakes accumulating on trees Thursday were a reminder of winter's coming.

Although May and June weddings are common, some couples opt to schedule the big day during the colder months.

Laura Rothlisberger, owner of Celebrations of the Heart, a store that provides wedding apparel, said her customers look for wedding dress styles that are popular throughout the year. She said winter doesn't necessarily change or dictate what styles of wedding dresses will be popular.

"Strapless continues to be very popular along with spaghetti strap styles," she said. "Women are also looking for dresses without a lot of detail or decorations. They're looking for more detail with the beading."

Rothlisberger said red has been a popular bridesmaid dress color for winter weddings.

"A lot of strapless bridesmaid dresses now come with a shawl for warmth," she said.

"Some people feel they need those specifically for winter."

Karen Medlin, owner of Westloop Floral, said roses and white lilies are always very popular during the winter season. She said burgundy, white, red, and silver accents are popular because they complement the winter theme.

Although summer is the most popular time, December is a good month because of time off from school and work.

"December is definitely a popular month," Medlin said. "They go with the holiday themes because, many times, families are available, and they have time to be together."

Medlin said trends depend on what customers see in magazines and bring in to show what kinds of arrangements they would like.

"There is some Martha Stewart influence," she said. "They'll find a picture they like and bring the magazines so we can see what they want."

Joy Winningham, senior catering manager at Holiday Inn and Holidome, said prime rib and roast beef are the most popular requests for menu items. She said customers order more deli-style sandwiches in the summer.

"You don't really have too many holiday-type things like turkey," Winningham said. "I think a lot of people may travel here for the wedding, and they want to experience beef because we're in Kansas."

Planning for a wedding in the winter isn't as hard for location schedulings, Rothlisberger said. The weekends after Thanksgiving, before and after Christmas and New Year's Day are all popular.

"Locations, services and caterers can be more available," she said, "But you still need to plan ahead."

Whether fancy or informal, help available to pop big question to significant other

By Karl Kennedy
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Valentine's Day was extra special for Missy Dibble, senior in hotel and restaurant management.

That was the day her boyfriend proposed.

She said that a long time ago, it was mentioned that when someone needed good luck, they would walk under the arch at the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art. She told her boyfriend about this then, but didn't think too much about it for a while.

Little did she know small superstition would give her even more luck that day.

"He took me blindfolded in his car. We drove around for a while and I didn't know where we were going," she said.

It turned out they were under the same arch she had mentioned to him years ago, and he asked her to marry him, she said.

"I was surprised he remembered the arch thing," she said. "It was a cute way to tie in our past and future."

April Blackmon, senior in print journalism, had a private proposal as well.

She said her boyfriend had planned to propose during Christmas, but the ring wasn't ready. When the ring was ready, he brought it to her.

"He came home and had a cheesy grin on his face, so I knew something was up," she said. "He asked me, and I said, 'Yes, but you have to get down on one knee.'"

He did, and later he got the ring cleaned, and asked her again — on one knee.

"Every guy gets down on one knee, it is what you always picture. It's like the proposal stance," she said.

Getting on one knee seems to be the conventional action when proposing, but there are other options.

The Web site www.proposal-ideas.com has many suggestions on creative ways to propose, including proposing just before midnight on New Year's Eve. Other Web sites such as www.ultimatewedding.com have archives of proposal stories.

There's even a site for female proposers at www.marriage.about.com.

Whether personal and private or wild and publicized, proposals mark an essential step to life with a loved one.

Celebrating our 39th year

COLUMN | Former K-State coach won't be much help against Wildcats

first arrived in Manhattan. But Mangino picked up some "Sooner Swagger" and lost some class when he followed Bob Stoops to OU.

Also, Mangino hasn't learned from his predecessors' mistakes. On Tuesday, he said, "History shows that they always play much, much better in Manhattan than they usually play on the road."

Unfortunately for the Youngstown State Penguin, Saturday will be like another home game for K-State. This is a trip the Cats take every other year to Memorial Stadium, a.k.a. KSU Stadium East.

Does Mangino really believe hordes of KU students will be packing into Memorial?

Let's be realistic. Most will spend their Saturday afternoon shopping at one of Lawrence's many organic food stores and then go home to pay homage to their Roy Williams shrine.

Mangino then went on to say "I know there's going to be a lot of fans here from Kansas State, but we're going to have a ton of fans here as well."

Even if the Jayhawks have some fans show up, the only chant they will do is the Rock Chalk Walk on their way out of the stadium mid-way through the first quarter.

Well, I guess we have to remember the source. This is coming from a guy that willingly took a head coaching position in Snyder's backyard.

But past experiences aside, this year's squad's chances don't look much better. Injuries are not going to help the Jayhawks' chances.

The one glimmer of hope for the endangered species known as KU football fans has been the play of freshman quarterback Bill Whittemore.

But he injured his knee against Missouri last Saturday, and he is questionable for the Sunflower Showdown.

The potential replacement? A fifth-year senior who has completed four passes at KU, and his name is Jonas.

The offensive threat known as Jonas Weatherbie completed one pass and was sacked for a safety against the lowly Tigers on his way to rolling up 12 yards of total offense.

These days, 12 yards and $5 bucks will buy you a Belfast Bomber at O'Malley's.

OK, so maybe he isn't that menacing of an athlete, but he comes from a successful football family, right?

Wrong again. Weatherbie's dad, Charlie, had the honor of losing 17 out of his last 18 games as head coach of Navy.

At least he hasn't gotten stuck in a Taco Bell drive-thru.

Weatherbie, though, is no stranger to the cuffs either. While the rest of the team prepares for Saturday's game, Weatherbie will be in Lawrence Municipal Court on Friday for a DUI hearing.

And who can blame him? I know I'd probably be hitting the bottle pretty hard after five years of being a part of KU football, too.

Chris is a senior in secondary education. You can e-mail him at chrishank@yahoo.com.

DEFENSE | Linemen excited to take on new KU quarterback

for a new guy coming in who hasn't played against a defense like ours," the senior captain said.

"A new quarterback is easier to rattle," he said. "As a defense, we just need to go out and put the pressure on him to perform."

In order to get that pressure on him, K-State will hope one of its four defensive ends is able to come up big. This season, two Wildcats have had multiple-sack games.

Defensive end Melvin Williams got two against Oklahoma State, and Andrew Shull has one two-sack game, and one three-sack game.

Shull was credited with four sacks against Baylor — enough to tie the school record for single game sacks — but coaches deducted one after reviewing the tape.

Saturday could be another record sack day for K-State. The Cats came close last weekend — just one away from tying the record.

But Pierce said for the Cats to have a chance this weekend, the defense will have to get out to a swift start and bring a solid defensive game.

"It's just going to be important for us — not only with the pass rush — to get up and get started real fast," he said. "Go in and get a quick three-and-out, quick three-and-out, and set the tone for the game."

BUDGET | Division of Facilities hopes to keep campus looking nice despite loss of 35 employees, funding cuts

strooms," Rice said. "Of course, we want to keep them clean every day."

Lindsey Praechter, facilities employee and senior in print journalism, said the restrooms are a concern for her.

"The cleanliness is always an issue," she said.

Rice said he hopes to be able to keep student and faculty morale high by keeping things looking nice, but it may not always be possible.

"It does have a toll because people can see that things aren't getting done," he said.

Praechter said she is genuinely concerned about the budget cuts as a student worker.

"Well, I don't just go to classes. I work in the building," she said. "I have to take a coat with me to wear during work because it is so cold."

The first call-back of funds for the division was $450,000, Rice said. He said the division has set aside another $400,000 for the possibility of more cutbacks in the spring.

Rice said that through the cutbacks, he feels it is important to keep the actual grounds of the campus looking nice.

"It's a morale booster," he said.

Praechter said she thinks it is important to keep the grounds clean for visitors, but that K-State students are concerned because they have to live, work and go to school here every day.

"We have to sit on the floors to wait for classes," she said. "And if there are dust bunnies and gunk, it's not enjoyable."

Another change students might feel directly is the heating and cooling in classrooms around campus, Rice said.

"We are going to keep it a little cooler in the winter and a little warmer in the summer," Rice said. "So my advice is just to dress appropriately."

Through the assistance of the State Department, facilities is in the middle of an energy survey that is being conducted by Viron Energy Services, of Overland Park, Kan., Rice said.

"They will be giving us a report back toward the end of this month with suggestions of how we can cut back our energy use," he said.

The savings from those decreases in energy use would be used to further balance the cuts, Rice said.

"I think we have a good core of staff who are doing the best we can," Rice said.

"We are all very proud of K-State and want to continue the history of excellence."

Budget cuts

This is the final story in a series exploring the effects of budget cuts made by the Kansas Legislature by analyzing each of K-State's 11 colleges, along with services that affect students. With mid-year cuts that could be detrimental to the university, higher education funding has become a top issue in the Nov. 5 elections. Visit www.kstatecollegian.com for previous coverage of budget cuts.

DEBATE | Candidates discuss education, budget

review their spending and cut back on unnecessary spending. He said Shallenburger believes 10 percent can be saved overall, eliminating the need to raise taxes.

"We'll take that money and fund K-12 and higher education and other core services a state should offer," Wilson said.

Students can take an active role in the government by expressing their opinions to legislators and other officials, he said.

Another way to decrease the financial strain on the state, Wilson said, is to examine the tax structure, especially tax exemptions.

"We don't need more taxes," he said, "we need more taxpayers."

By decreasing the amount of tax exemptions, more people will be paying taxes, and each individual can pay less, Wilson said.

The size of the state government has been growing at twice the rate of inflation, Wilson said, which will have to be controlled if the budget is to be balanced.

If the growth rate is nearer that of inflation, there would be fewer obstacles in balancing the budget.

"The biggest problem is that the Legislature can't say no to anyone or anything," Wilson said.

"We need to go back and find deficiencies and still be able to maintain services."

Wilson said that as Lt. Governor, Lindstrom would visit colleges and universities throughout the state.

Whatever one's political opinions might be, Wilson said, it is important to make a well-informed decision when voting.

"Don't believe everything you hear," he said.

"Look for yourself. Listen to the candidates. The worst thing you can do is not vote."

Kansans prepare for vote

Candidates discuss views on higher education funding, future of state farming

1. At K-State, library hours are being cut, tuition has been rising and faculty are experiencing hiring freezes. How much of a priority is higher education to you? How will you ensure that funding for higher education doesn't hinder the quality of education?

We must keep the funding promises made to Kansas institutions of higher learning when the Board of Regents was reorganized. As governor, I will be committed to protecting higher education funding, so that all students will be able to continue to afford attending our colleges and universities.

I fully support continued funding to build research facilities at Kansas institutions of higher learning. The initiative to build new life science buildings at KU, agri-terrorism buildings at K-State, and to enhance aviation research at Wichita State holds tremendous potential.

I look forward to working with civic leaders, private business owners, community foundations and health professionals to strengthen Kansas' commitment to higher education. Our colleges, universities, and technical schools are part of the driving force of our economy. Businesses will locate in areas that can provide them with a well-trained work force.

My commitment to education, both K-12 and higher education, is unwavering.

1. At K-State, library hours are being cut, tuition has been rising and faculty are experiencing hiring freezes. How much of a priority is higher education to you? How will you ensure that funding for higher education doesn't hinder the quality of education?

Higher education is a high priority of mine. I believe we have good colleges and universities in our state. In fact, my daughter Candice attended Kansas State University and received an excellent education there.

We need to continue investing in higher education in this state. Our goal should be that every Kansan ready to enter college will want to stay within the state. However, during this time of economic misfortune, it is a challenge to invest more dollars into higher education. Thus, we need to work together in identifying and eliminating wasteful spending in government. Once done, the money that is freed up can go to providing essential services to Kansans, including investing in higher education.

2. What funding will you give to public education, K-12? What level of priority is this for you?

K-12 funding is our top priority. We will rewrite the school finance formula. It is time that the state provide a suitable education for every school district in Kansas. In addition, we

No injuries reported from Sunday night fire on Manhattan's east side

No injuries were reported from a fire late Sunday evening.

Three trucks were dispatched at 7:36 p.m. to 2306 Casement Road for a blaze that apparently started around the fireplace of the residential structure, Battalion Chief Arlen Loecker said.

Neither the cause nor the damage amount has been determined because the investigation is not complete, Loecker said.

Week to celebrate spirit

Homecoming gives students chance to show purple pride

By Crystal Welborn
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Open the gates, here comes the flood of purple pride.

This year's All-University Homecoming, Wildcat World Tour '02, is planned to connect the university's past and current students, as well as community members together to celebrate school spirit.

"It's designed to welcome home those who bleed purple and have Wildcats at heart," said Danielle Cupryk, junior in speech pathology and member of the Homecoming committee.

Missy Decker-Heidrick, associate director of alumni programs and chairwoman of the Homecoming committee, said the goal of the committee is to encourage community members and alumni to get involved in Homecoming.

"Homecoming allows so many people to get involved and feel the K-State spirit," she said. "All of our events are open to the public, and we encourage everyone to come to any of the events."

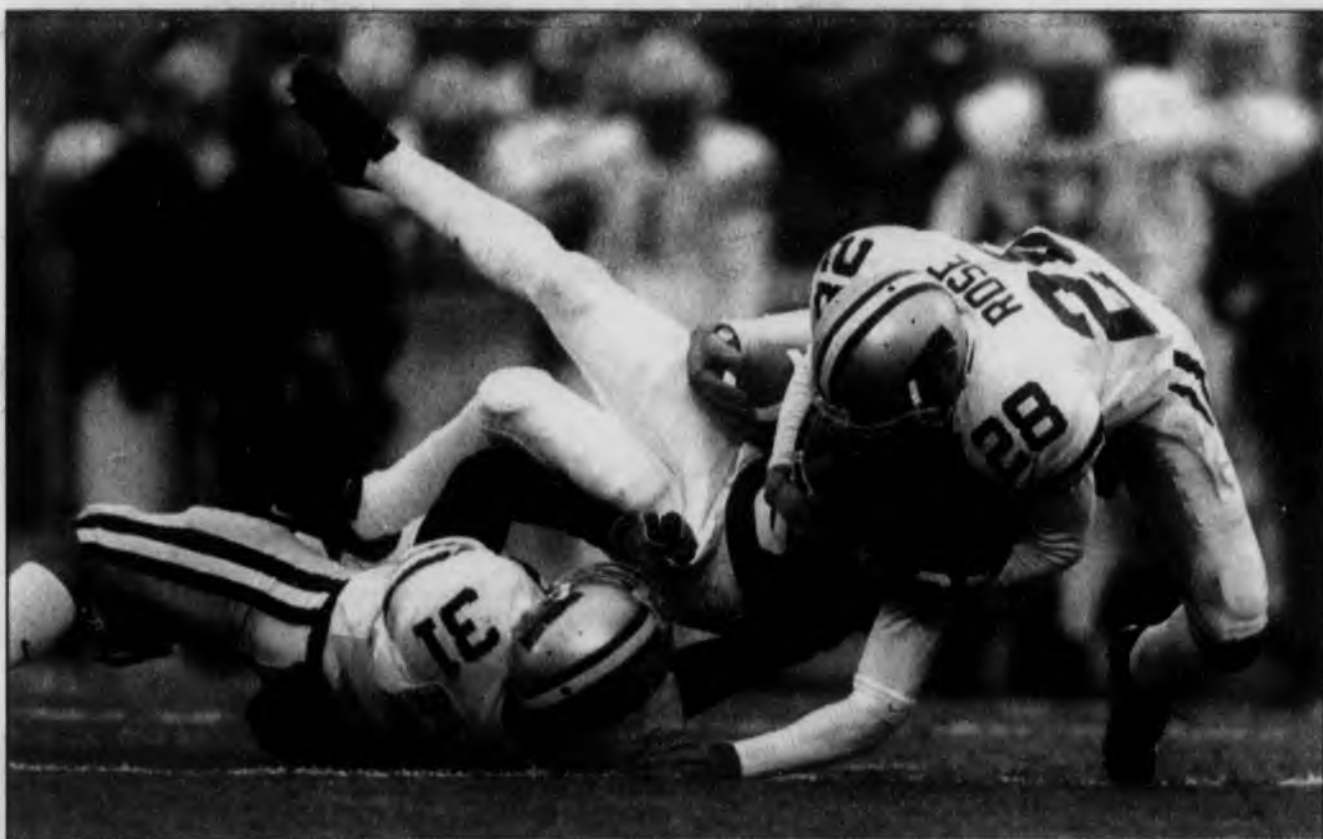

There are events geared toward the community and non-students. Paint Manhattan, which is part of today's festivities, is an event where local children are allowed to paint the windows of local businesses in accordance with the Homecoming theme.

Bill Brohman, general manager of Buffalo Wild Wings in Aggieville, said he is having his windows decorated to join in the Homecoming spirit.

"We want to be in the community and have fun," he said. "Homecoming is part of the heritage, and it's why everyone

LAWRENCE — On what marked the 100th meeting between K-State and Kansas, the Cats left no doubt as to who was the better team.

K-State added 64 reasons Saturday to an already decade-long list detailing why the Governor's Cup still sits in Vanier Complex, as it walked all over the Jayhawks 64-0 at Memorial Stadium in Lawrence.

But perhaps it was the first two that really sent the message as to how difficult it would be for Kansas to gain yards when it needed to.

"In any rival game, the tone has to be set," linebacker Terry Pierce said.

That tone was set early, too.

The Cats opened with the ball on their own 26-yard line, after Terence Newman returned the opening kickoff 25 yards.

How bad was it?

K-State's 64-0 victory over Kansas set a number of marks. Here are a few.

- Saturday was the first time K-State shut out KU since Nov. 5, 1955.
- The Cats' 64 points were the most in a game by K-State in the series.
- The 64-point margin was the largest by either team in the 100-game series.
- The win is the 10th in a row for the Wildcats, matching the series' longest run (KU's 10 straight from 1956-65).
- K-State's 313 first-half yards were the most by the Cats in a half this season.
- The Cats tallied a season high in both rushing yards (337) and attempts (60).

as Newman downed the ball at the 1-yard line.

Pierce said the defense had a one-track mind at that point.

comes back to Manhattan. We want to be part of the celebration."

The committee also has brought back a popular event for K-State alumni. Cupryk said the Homecoming tailgate competition is a good event for alumni who want to show off their creative sides.

"It's a great way for alumni to get involved in Homecoming, and they usually get really into it — it's really fun," she said.

The Crazy Cat Kickoff tonight is another way for students in the residence halls to show their Wildcat spirit.

Cupryk said the event is at 7 p.m. in Weber Arena, and is all about physical competition. "It's like a field day," she said.

"There are races and field events to participate in."

Today is also the day for the Wildcat Request Live show where greek organizations get together to lip sync and dance.

"It's an excellent way to get the students' take on the theme and incorporate it into dance," Cupryk said. "It's also age appropriate, so there are no explicit lyrics."

Cupryk said Homecoming is for all students, and there are other ways to get involved in the festivities than through a person's living arrangements.

"We really want students who aren't in the residence halls or greek houses to get involved with Homecoming, and the best way we can do that is through student organizations," Cupryk said.

On Wednesday, student organizations can express themselves with the sidewalk chalking contest. Members from organizations are encouraged to showcase their artistic talent in the Union Plaza, armed only with a piece of sidewalk chalk.

"Most of the student organizations aren't operating with much money, so this is a cost-effective way to get them involved," Cupryk said.

Although the community is important to Homecoming, Decker-Heidrick said the week's focus is still on the students.

"The students work so hard, and we are so proud of what they do because what they do benefits everyone," she said. "Homecoming should be a lot of fun this year."

Race to raise student scholarship money

Departments to test athletic abilities for scholarship money

By Nancy Foster
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

English versus kinesiology. Biology versus economics. This is no academic competition, though. It is an athletic competition between academic departments.

"Kinesiology won last year, but in the past, we usually get a lot of competition from the English department," said Christine Ferguson, director of the fifth consecutive Flint Hills Fall Classic 5k run/walk.

Ferguson said the Department of Kinesiology sponsors the race to raise money for student scholarships. The race will begin at 10 a.m. Nov. 10 between Ahearn Field House and the K-State Student Union.

Students, faculty and staff from all departments can enter the race.

Trophies are awarded to the department with the most participants and to the department with the three fastest race times. Trophies also are awarded to businesses with the most participants and with the three fastest times.

Entry fees are $20. Participants receive a T-shirt, refreshments and door prizes. There are seven age categories, ranging from 17 years and younger to 60 years and older.

"We try to encourage people to even come out and walk because it is a good time," Ferguson said. "So we encourage our students to get their friends, fraternities, sororities to get out and take a walk that morning."

Race revenue provides two to three scholarships for students in the kinesiology department. However, students can receive the scholarship only if they volunteered during the event or helped organize it.

Carla Feldkamp, junior in kinesiology and pre-physical therapy, won a $300 scholarship last year. She said it helped pay for tuition and fees.

"I was surprised because I didn't even know they were giving out scholarships, but I was happy," she said.

She said she enjoyed the race because it introduced her to many students in her major.

"It was fun for me because you meet a lot of people, and exercising is just good to do," Feldkamp said.

She said other students should get involved.

"I had fun," Feldkamp said. "If you volunteer for it, you would have a lot of fun."

The race raised about $1,000 last year, and about 250 people participated, Ferguson said.

"The neat thing about the race is there's a wide range of fitness levels that come out and do it. There are individuals that run competitively that come out and do it, and they can run the course pretty fast, and then there are individuals that come with their families, and they walk the whole way," she said.

Ferguson said the event is also the state championship race for the Road Runners Club of America, an association that regulates and sets standards for road races.

She said the annual race is not only important because it provides scholarships, but it also is important because of the activity.

"It's important to our department because we try to encourage people to be active and get out, so it's kind of nice to see people out running and walking and enjoying, hopefully, a nice fall day," Ferguson said.

TO THE POINT

Active approach makes Sebelius Collegian's pick

After reviewing the gubernatorial candidates' political agendas, the Collegian has selected Kathleen Sebelius as the best candidate for governor.

Sebelius is taking a proactive approach to campaigning, providing specific plans to better the state of Kansas.

Most notable is her plan to perform a detailed financial audit of state agencies and departments.

She has a comprehensive objective for the future of our state and its residents, which includes higher education as one of her top priorities.

Unlike her opponents, Sebelius does not make hard and fast promises — promises that are difficult to keep. She sets goals and is careful not to make statements she will be unable to follow through with if elected.

Sebelius is knowledgeable about current issues, such as higher education, taxes, K-12 education and health care. When she speaks, she cites specific examples, not vague explanations.

Her plan to conduct a top-to-bottom financial review of the state shows her resourcefulness and initiative to get things done.

Sebelius' logic and straight answers make her the top choice for governor.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Bodies, brains working hard

Cuerpos y mentes en dura faena

LORENA BARBOZA

Editor's note: Lorena is pursuing a doctoral degree in curriculum and instruction. Every Monday, she will tackle an issue in her native language, Spanish, as well as English. Gloria Freeland, assistant professor of journalism, edits the columns. Both columns convey the same message and allow the Collegian to reach a more diverse audience. You can e-mail her at lorena@ksu.edu.

Another semester is almost gone. In a short time, few will remember the efforts made to reach the end of the term.

Academic life is a challenge. To know is great. To learn is very hard. We set our minds in motion through the whole body: the five senses to perceive and get information, the heart to keep the blood circulating, the stomach to process the necessary energy, the bones and muscles to keep moving, and the neurons to trap the concepts and understand the world. If one of those fine and delicate mechanisms fail, the whole learning process suffers.

The miracle is that often the mind keeps going even when the body is not much help. But sooner or later, the brightest mind also will fail if the body does not work.

As soon as students get to campus to start a new semester, they learn that stress is hiding under notebooks, books and test sheets — ready to express itself as a sudden sharp pain or as a blue mood. Fatigue, sorrow, homesickness, sensitivity, insecurity, anguish and dread start undermining the enthusiastic mood the students had on enrollment day.

The desire to learn is blocked. The need to know, the urge to read quickly, to grasp the content, the rush to write papers, to answer questions and to get as many A's as possible undermines strength and depletes energy. Then we learn that we have to do something about it — and learn the hard way. It is time to discover the gym. One day we put on the tennis shoes, the sweat suit, the shorts and other activewear and parade to the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex. There, we all join the busy crowd. Some lift heavy weights, and some lift light ones.

It is the temple of the body. The crowd looks like a mysterious sect in its ceremonial gowns, performing the complicated rites of penitence, taming the body and saving the mind. In the summer heat or during spring rains and winter snows, the brothers and sisters of the exercise religion meet. Nobody socializes because conversation is not welcome. But there is a quiet solidarity. If you have trouble with a machine or wonder how to do a specific exercise, somebody is willing to come and tell you how to solve the problem, how to improve performance and how to go on and on and on ...

No one applauds. We, the brothers and sisters of the gym, know we have to do this in order to survive, to set free our minds' wings, to keep climbing the mountains of knowledge, to arrive at the goal and take in our hands the golden medal we all deserve for the sublime struggle with ourselves. Let's keep working hard!

Otro semestre que está por terminar. Dentro de poco tiempo, muy pocos recordarán los esfuerzos hechos para llegar al final.

La vida académica es un reto continuo. Adquirir el conocimiento es grandioso, aprenderlo es muy duro.

Todos ejercitamos nuestra mente a través del movimiento de todo nuestro cuerpo: los sentidos nos ayudan a percibir, entender y pensar en la realidad, el corazón hace correr la sangre por todo el cuerpo, el estómago procesa los alimentos para generar energía, los músculos y los huesos nos mantienen en movimiento, y las neuronas capturan los conceptos y nos ayudan a comprender el mundo.

Si uno de estos finos y delicados mecanismos fracasa, todo el proceso de aprendizaje sufre.

El milagro es que muchas veces la mente continúa su marcha aunque el cuerpo no ayude mucho; pero tarde o temprano, la grandiosa mente se doblegará si el cuerpo no trabaja bien.

Tan pronto como cada estudiante regresa al Campus para iniciar un nuevo semestre de clases, aprende que el estrés se esconde detrás de los cuadernos, los libros y los exámenes; allí está, listo para aparecer en cualquier momento y producir dolores severos o mantenernos malhumorados casi todo el tiempo.

Cansancio, fatiga, pesa, extrema sensibilidad, nostalgia, inseguridad, angustia y miedo comienzan a afectar el entusiasmo que teníamos el día de la matrícula.

El deseo por aprender llega a bloquearse.

La necesidad de saber, la urgencia de leer a gran velocidad y captar el contenido claramente, la desesperación de tener que escribir muchos ensayos y contestar muchas preguntas y conseguir el mayor numero de "A's" como nota final, afecta la fuerza y debilita la energía.

Entonces entendemos que hay que hacer algo al respecto y aprendemos dolorosamente la lección.

Es el momento de descubrir el gimnasio.

Un día nos ponemos los zapatos deportivos, el buzo, el pantaloncito corto y la ropa apropiada para hacer ejercicios y desfilamos hacia el Complejo de Recreación Chester E. Peters.

Nos aglomeramos allí para jugar squash, tennis, basketball, softbol; otros corren en las pistas o lo hacen en las máquinas estacionarias; algunos solo hacen bicicleta sin ir de un lugar a otro y hay quienes ejercitan los músculos en el área de pesas.

Ese es el templo del cuerpo. Todos parecemos miembros de una secta misteriosa, vestidos especialmente para la ceremonia, realizando los complicados ritos como penitencia, amansando el cuerpo y salvando la mente.

En el calor del verano, bajo la lluvia de la primavera o en medio de la nieve del invierno, las hermanas y los hermanos del ejercicio llegamos al Rec. Nadie socializa porque la conversación no es bienvenida.

Sin embargo, se vive un ambiente solidario. Si hay algún problema con una máquina, o si no sabemos cómo hacer un ejercicio, alguien llega e indica cómo resolver el problema y cómo sacar la tarea y seguir, seguir y seguir...

Allí nadie aplaude a nadie. Todas las hermanas y los hermanos del gimnasio sabemos lo que tenemos que hacer para sobrevivir, darle alas a nuestras mentes y seguir escalando las montañas del conocimiento para llegar a la meta dorada de alcanzar el premio que cada uno merece por la sublime lucha que damos con nosotros mismos.

¡Sigamos trabajando duro!

News outlets able to challenge injustices with detailed reporting

You might remember the movie "Twelve Angry Men," starring Henry Fonda, Lee J. Cobb and E.G. Marshall.

Most of the dramatic film takes place inside a jury room as a dozen people deliberate at the end of a murder trial. It's hot. At the outset, most of the jurors are eager to render a guilty verdict and go home.

As the story unfolds, viewers learn that some are influenced by prejudice against the dark-skinned defendant.

We'd like to think that such bias doesn't hold sway in jury rooms these days. After all, "Twelve Angry Men" came out in 1957, and a lot of progress has occurred since then.

But stereotypes and semi-conscious racism are still widespread factors.

An essay in the new anthology, "Race and Resistance," notes, "the power of the media is profound," and adds, "its most powerful impact is on children, who frame definitions of, and draw conclusions about, the world through the messages they receive."

Written by mass communications professor Alice Tait and journalist Todd Burroughs, the essay refers to an internalized racial spin in the United States: "Studies conducted in the 1990s show that children across all races associate positive characteristics more with white characters they see on television and negative characteristics with the minority characters."

Several years ago, physician Michael LeNoir coined the apt term "image distortion disorder" to describe a prevalent social dynamic that blurs and obscures our humanity.

"Most of the images that one ethnic group has of another are developed by the media," LeNoir said.

Some repetitive media representations of minorities "have a devastating effect on every person in this country and undermine any attempt to bring us together as a people," says LeNoir, who practices medicine in Oakland, Calif. He advocates speaking out: "Those of us in America who are concerned about race relations must react to obvious distortions in the media by raising our voices in protest over the never-ending attempt to portray people of color in these caricatured, fragmented and distorted images."

Such images have profound consequences in many spheres — including the courts. News outlets frequently exacerbate the illness of "image distortion disorder," but they're sometimes effective at calling attention to how racism contributes to present-day injustices.

One of the virtues of a recent special report is that it did just that.

In a documentary called "Deadly Decisions," from American RadioWorks, correspondent Alan Berlow found that "jurors may be influenced by their own fears and prejudices when they sentence people to death."

The documentary, co-produced by Minnesota Public Radio and NPR News, succeeded in ways that public radio shows like "Morning Edition" and "All Things Considered" routinely fail.

Meticulously researched, the report devoted an hour to scrutinizing what happens under the surface.

The result was journalism that explained how people can be put to death by a legal system that's equitable but functionally skewed against defendants without white skin or financial resources.

Such stories are difficult to tell with detailed care. But when journalists find ways, there is more hope for the future.

Saudi foreign minister refuses use of territory

Saudi cooperation during strike against Iraq limited, even with U.N. support

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

CAIRO, Egypt — Saudi Arabia will not allow bases on its soil to be used for an attack on Iraq even if the United Nations authorizes military action, Saudi Foreign Minister Prince Saud al-Faisal said in an interview broadcast Sunday.

Saudi Arabia earlier ruled out the use of its territory for unilateral U.S. action against Iraq but had indicated it would cooperate in some way if the U.N. Security Council approved.

In the CNN interview, however, Saud said more clearly that Saudi cooperation would not include permitting use of its territory for strikes against Iraq.

"We will cooperate with the Security Council, but as to entering the conflict or using the facilities as part of the conflict, that is something else," Saud said.

Pressed about whether Saudi bases could be used, he gave a definite "no."

In Washington, White House spokesman Ari Fleischer refused to comment on the CNN interview.

White House aide Mary Matalin responded obliquely when asked about Saud's comments in a separate CNN interview.

"We have many friends and allies in the region, and we have many friends and allies around the world. There is no doubt that George Bush will not enter into any kind of conflict unless he's sure of victory," she said.

Saud also said his government believed it was still possible to avoid war.

"Iraq has made a very clear and unambiguous promise to the Arab countries that it will abide by the United Nations resolutions," he said.

The Security Council is debating a U.S. proposal to toughen U.N. weapons inspections after Iraq agreed to allow inspectors to return after nearly four years. The United States wants the council to authorize harsh measures against Iraq if it fails to cooperate.

However, Russia, China and France oppose the American proposal, fearing it would give a green light to Washington to attack Iraq without further consultations.

Security Council members expect the United States to offer an amended draft resolution this week.

Arab nations have spoken out against unilateral U.S. military intervention to oust Iraqi President Saddam Hussein. They have indicated more willingness to accept such action if the United Nations approves.

Most Arab nations joined the U.S.-led Gulf War coalition that liberated Kuwait in 1991.

Saudi Arabia allowed U.S. troops into the oil-rich kingdom to defend it against Iraq.

U.S. command-and-control facilities have been based in the kingdom, but Washington is now beefing up a base in the Gulf nation of Qatar.

Arab foreign ministers are scheduled to meet in Cairo on Nov. 10 to discuss how to avert the crisis in Iraq.

American Indian culture focus of this month's Festival of Nations

By Rogie Dorpinghaus
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

From noon to 1 p.m. today in the Union Courtyard, American Indian culture will be celebrated during Union Program Council's Festival of Nations.

Erica Smith, co-chair of UPC's multicultural committee and senior in apparel marketing and design, said two students from Haskell Indian Nations University in Lawrence, Kan., will perform a traditional Navajo tribal dance.

Samples of traditional American Indian food will be available, including fried bread and pumpkin pie, Smith said.

Essence Halliburton, co-chair of UPC multicultural committee, said the committee found the student performers by asking American Indians on campus about their culture.

"We try to get in contact with different organizations that represent the heritage we are celebrating to find out what entertainment and food would best represent their culture," said Halliburton, senior in business marketing and international business.

The multicultural committee sponsors the Festival of Nations, scheduled for the first Monday of each month.

Natalie Gervais, vice president of UPC, said the Festival of Nations events help students expand their knowledge of different ethnic groups.

"The Festival of Nations is opening minds of students to different cultures," she said. "We do this to educate students to learn more about different cultures than just their own."

Gervais, junior in human resource management, said it benefits students to have a knowledge of other cultures when searching for a job.

She said that in the real world, people work with people of different cultures every day.

Halliburton said the multicultural committee's goal is to teach about other cultures.

"A lot of students come from rural backgrounds and didn't have the opportunity to learn about other cultures," she said. "We try to educate and give opportunities to students to experience different cultures. That's why we make everything free."

Politician joins Israeli Cabinet, demands early elections

Netanyahu, Sharon will battle to lead party in upcoming election

By Greg Myre
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ariel Sharon sought to keep his imperiled government afloat Sunday by bringing former premier Benjamin Netanyahu into the Cabinet, while Netanyahu set a tough condition for joining — early elections.

Israel's two leading right-wing politicians, Sharon and Netanyahu, are trying to work out an alliance while also battling each other to lead the Likud Party into the country's next general election.

The ballot must be held before next November but could be brought forward to early next year if Sharon resigns or if his fragile coalition collapses in the coming days or weeks.

That could plunge Israel into even more turmoil as the Israeli-Palestinian conflict drags on and with a U.S. war with Iraq on the horizon.

In the complex rivalry between Sharon and Netanyahu, both stressed their efforts to resolve the current political crisis, and played down any suggestion they were jockeying for advantage in the next election.

"I told (Sharon) that I'll be happy to serve as foreign minister on condition that we go to early elections," Netanyahu told Israeli television.

"The right thing is to immediately go to new elections," he added, predicting that Likud would double its current 19 seats in the parliament.

Sharon wants Netanyahu in the government, a development that could help stabilize the coalition.

In addition, Netanyahu would presumably be subject to the discipline of Cabinet decisions, rather than having the freedom to criticize the government from the outside.

Sharon "praised the decision in principle by Mr. Netanyahu to join his government," the prime minister's office said in a statement.

Netanyahu's demand for early elections was "being examined," Sharon's office added.

Netanyahu could harm his image if he flatly refused to join the government at a moment of crisis.

But analysts said he is reluctant to serve under Sharon as the race for party leader intensifies.

Sharon is the current Likud leader, but a party primary must be held before the next general election.

Some polls have shown Netanyahu winning a head-to-head contest.

He would then be positioned to become the next prime minister, according to the polls that show Likud winning the largest number seats in the next election.

In Israel's chronically unstable political system, the winner of any election will have to work out alliances with a host of smaller parties. Such governments regularly fall, and the country has had five prime ministers in the past seven years.

Sharon's broad-based coalition government lost its majority in parliament last week when the moderate Labor Party, the largest single faction, quit over a dispute about funding to Jewish settlements in the West Bank and Gaza.

Cats roll over Cyclones, extend winning streak to 9

By Sean Purcell
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After going a perfect 8-0 in October, the volleyball team didn't let up in its first November match.

The Cats (15-6, 11-2) swept past Iowa State (10-15, 1-12) 30-12, 30-19, 30-20 Saturday night in Ahearn Field House, extending its winning streak to nine.

K-State's streak now stands as the second longest in school history. The 1999 team won nine, as did the 1978 Wildcat squad.

In 1977, the Cats won 13 straight.

But Coach Suzie Fritz said she tries not to wrap herself up in talk of streaks and records. She said she just wants her team to get better, and it did that against Iowa State.

"Very pleased. Hitting .348 — that's good against anybody," she said. "We wanted to push a lot of quicks, so we wanted to get Lisa Martin and Lauren Goehring a lot of balls. I didn't think we were accomplishing that early in the match because of our passing."

Game 1: K-State 30, Iowa State 12
Game 2: K-State 30, Iowa State 19
Game 3: K-State 30, Iowa State 20

"But as our passing improved, we were able to get our quick hitters going. The more you can push quick, your hitting percentage is generally going to go up."

Although both Martin and Goehring played big roles in the victory, eight and nine kills respectively, it was Cari Jensen who once again paced the Cats.

Jensen had 14 kills on a .462 hitting percentage, extending a streak of her own to 12-straight double-digit kill matches.

"Our team is just on a roll right now," Jensen said. "Everyone is playing well, and it takes six people to be great out there. It takes the pass, and it takes the set. Everybody just played well tonight."

A welcomed Saturday addition to the Wildcat rotation who had been missing the past six matches was sophomore Michaela Franklin.

Franklin is still recovering from a second-degree ankle sprain but was healthy enough to play sparingly in each of the three games Saturday.

"I was happy to give her an opportunity to play," Fritz said. "It certainly was not an issue with Katie Stanzel. We won nine straight matches with Katie Stanzel in the lineup — she's doing a terrific job."

"We want to have some depth, so in order to do that, we have to get some people some playing time, especially in matches like that."

Franklin said she isn't 100 percent yet but said she feels like she's getting closer to that number.

The biggest obstacle now, she said, is getting back into the rhythm of playing.

"Right when I was getting into the system and understanding, I hurt my ankle," Franklin said. "I've never been hurt before, so that was new to me. It was like starting all over again, learning how to block, how to approach and all that kind of stuff."

Women cruise past Team Concept

Wecker's effort exhibition opener

By Michael Watson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The first brick has been laid for what players hope to be a repeat of 2001.

K-State won its first game of the season Saturday in Bramlage Coliseum, 110-63, in an exhibition match against Team Concept, a team composed of former college players who now play either in the WNBA or overseas.

Coach Deb Patterson said it's great to have the first game under the team's belt, but there are some improvements that need to be made.

"The first thing that comes to mind is our defensive adjustments — the individual accountability in making adjustments," she said.

Team Concept shot eight of 22 from outside the three-point arch.

Team Concept's Reyna Fortenberry went toe to toe with three-point threat Laurie Koehn by sinking four of six three-pointers.

"That is something we can do very quickly," Patterson said. "We just need to adjust to the opponent's offense."

The second thing Patterson said she wants to improve is the number of turnovers. K-State had 19 on Saturday.

"Tonight we tried to do too much too soon," Patterson said. "That's a timing element and a familiarity element."

However, Patterson said she was pleased with a Cat defense that held Team Concept to 32-percent shooting.

The Cats also totaled 38 defensive rebounds, eight blocks and six steals.

Koehn, who led K-State in treys during her freshman campaign with 122, started slowly in the first half, hitting only one of six attempts.

But she came out firing in the second half, hitting four of five outside the arch.

Friday night was like Christmas Eve, Koehn said. The whole team was excited to get back on the court.

Overall, Koehn was nine of 15 from the field, including five for 11 three-pointers, totaling 23 points.

She said the credit should be given to her teammates.

"I was getting wide-open looks from what (Nicole Ohlde and Kendra Wecker) were doing," Koehn said. "They're collapsing, and then kicking the ball out. They are giving me open shots."

Wecker said she had a lot of great passes from her teammates, accounting for her 14 of 20 field goals and 31 points.

"The way our offense works, if it works right, we are going to get some easy looks," Wecker said.

It did work Saturday night, under the leadership of Wecker, Patterson said.

She said Wecker played a lead role in the contest, and the other players fed off her leadership.

"Kendra asserted herself so effectively tonight," Patterson said. "She was extremely active going to the board. That made her an even better player tonight."

Patterson said Wecker was not the only active one Saturday night. She also said Ohlde played well.

Ohlde went six of 10 from the field and eight of 11 from the line for 20 total points. She proved that she not only can play hard, but she also can dish the ball to open players.

Ohlde had nine assists during the game.

That will be a tremendous asset for the Cats when they face stronger teams, Patterson said.

"If she comes off the floor with nine assists, other teams are going to pay if they pay too much attention to her," she said.

Ohlde also led the team with 15 rebounds, a big part of what it takes to be a top team, Patterson said.

As a team, the Cats totaled 58 rebounds, 20 on offense and 38 on defense. Patterson said that kind of ball control is exactly what K-State wants.

"We were very effective in getting into an aggressive flow," Patterson said. "We moved the ball and were attack-oriented."

Intrasquad contests prepare team for real competition

By Michael Watson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Wildcats want to see the same fire they saw two weeks ago.

Women's golf has not seen tournament action since the team won the Marilyn Sunflower Invitational on Oct. 14 and 15.

Coach Kristi Knight said she hopes her team keeps the ball rolling when they travel to Kiawah Island, S.C., today and Tuesday to close the fall season at the Edwin Watts/Palmetto Intercollegiate at the Oak Point Golf Course.

"We've had a great fall with good consistent hitting," Knight said. "We are definitely moving forward, and the team is ready to compete again."

Knight said Oak Point is a different course from what the Wildcats have played. Most of the holes are lined with trees, and there are narrow fairways that are threats to less accurate players.

But she said it's nothing the team can't handle.

"It isn't anything we haven't seen before, but it will be the first time this year," she said. "I am confident that we can adjust because we do hit the ball accurately. Karen (Quintelier) is the only player who hasn't seen this course."

K-State also will play a more competitive field.

The Wildcats will face two top-20 teams. According to www.golfweek.com, Tulane is ranked No. 14 and Oklahoma is ranked No. 20.

Knight said the Wildcats will be looking to beat the whole field, but they are especially gunning at the two Big 12 opponents — Missouri and Oklahoma.

K-State hasn't finished better than the No. 38-ranked Tigers in two tries, and they have not seen the Sooners at all this fall.

"OU and Mizzou both have great golf programs," Knight said. "We have not seen Oklahoma yet this season, but we will see them four or five times this spring. They finished second last year in the Big 12, so it's good to see them now."

Knight said the Cats are at the top of their game and are ready for top Big 12 competition like Oklahoma.

"Coaches usually say their team needs to practice their short game, but looking at the stats, we are better than last year," Knight said. "We've given some shots away, but we are better than last year. But we still need to practice."

She said the team has been mixing in a little competitive fun to keep its edge.

"We've been having contests to help our putting and chipping," Knight said. "We always need to work on finishing holes. The contests add the competition they see on the course. The object is to get the ball in the hole, and the contest adds the competition."

Knight said the winners get bragging rights. This week it was senior Miranda Smith winning the short game contest and senior Elise Carpenter for low score on the par three course.

Junior Christine Boucher continues to roll for the Wildcats. She is leading K-State with a 74.75 stroke average. She finished in the top three for the fifth time in her career, placing second at the Marilyn Sunflower Invitational.

That tournament was also her third top-10 finish this season.

Knight said she hopes the last tournament caps a great fall season.

"We've had a great fall, and we hope to finish up strong," she said. "It's been a couple weeks, but the team is ready to go and compete again."

Big 12 | Baylor coach fired

Baylor football coach Kevin Steele, whose team has won only one Big 12 game in his four seasons, was fired Sunday.

Athletics director Tom Stanton said Steele has agreed to finish out the season. The Bears are 3-6 and 1-4 in the conference.

Baylor snapped a 29-game Big 12 losing streak with a 35-32 victory over Kansas on Oct. 5. Steele was the coach for the streak's last 24 games.

Baylor lost to Texas Tech 62-11 on Saturday.

LYRICAL JOURNEY

Amos sizzles in best album since 'Boys for Pele'

Conceptual albums are risky gambles for musicians, but this one pays off for Tori Amos.

"Scarlet's Walk" finds Amos telling the story of a fictional character's Kerouac-esque journey across the United States. The album is artistic, eloquent and dense, but it can come off as pretentious for non-Amos fans.

That won't be much of a surprise for fans who have followed her through albums like the loosely conceptual "Boys for Pele" and the strict confines of "Strange Little Girl." "Scarlet's Walk" is her most ambitious and complex concept yet.

In "Strange Little Girl," Amos created fictional character vignettes by covering songs written by men in a new way. If that album was a bundle of short stories, "Scarlet's Walk" is the equivalent of a novel.

Track two, "A Sorta Fairy Tale," is the first single from the album, and is a perfect introduction into this modern American fairy tale told in 18 tracks. Where "Little Earthquakes" and "Under the Pink" told Amos' personal stories, this album tells the story of someone else, Scarlet, and literally maps the trajectory of the change that comes over her throughout her journey.

The album sleeve includes lyrics, pictures of Amos as Scarlet in different parts of the country and a map. The map shows the exact route of the character's journey according to the song that tells each part of the story.

To put it lightly, this is an album you'll need to spend some time with if you want to begin digesting the allegories and meanings within the work.

The usual riddle-laden lyrics are back for Amos fans to break down and argue on Internet message boards for the next couple of years, but this album has a couple of curve balls to throw. First of all, the linear structure of the songs and the correlating story add new layers to the meanings of songs. Second, this is Amos like you haven't heard since 1996.

Starting with "From the Choirgirl Hotel" Amos started to explore new ways of approaching songs. The studio disc of "To Venus and Back" was an abstract experiment that yielded mixed results and a lukewarm reception. "Scarlet's Walk" combines the styles Amos used in her first three albums.

The song structures are reminiscent of "Under the Pink" and "Little Earthquakes," most notably so on album opener "Amber Waves" and "Taxi Ride," but the album is a 74-minute linear experience in the style of "Boys for Pele."

The result is exciting. It combines the best in Amos' original styles but pushes her artistry further without becoming a repeat of things she has done in the past. Amos' personal life has become a relatively happy one, with a child and a husband, so instead of fabricating pain for art to recreate "Little Earthquakes," she becomes a story-teller.

Besides that, the album has its own song-gems, such as the melodic ballad "Your Cloud."

Amos fans will quickly take to this album. However, it might be advisable for those new to the red-headed siren to at least listen to "Little Earthquakes" before taking on this work.

"Scarlet's Walk" serves as a testament to Amos' artistic longevity 10 years after her debut, and it is her best album since "Boys for Pele."

Stellar performers, quirky characters make Salinger rip-off worth seeing

Screenwriting 101: Ripping off Salinger is a quick way of writing a decent movie about teenage disillusionment.

At least that's what screenwriter and director Burr Steers is banking on in "Igby Goes Down."

And actually, Steers does an OK job of basically thrusting Holden Caulfield into the 21st century in this meaningful little sleeper-hit of a drama. Its quirky characters, angry youth and stellar performances make the movie at least worth watching.

"Igby" combines elements of "Catcher in the Rye" with modern coming-of-age films, most notably 1998's, "The Adventures of Sebastian Cole." Where "Sebastian Cole" focused on the anti-relationship between the title character and his cross-dressing stepfather, this focuses on the anti-relationship between Igby and his mother.

Igby (Kieran Culkin) is a 17-year-old prep-school brat with a rich but mentally ill and hospitalized father (Bill Pullman). His rich mother (Susan Sarandon) is dying of cancer, and his rich godfather (Jeff Goldblum) throws money at supporting him. Igby's rich older brother (Ryan Phillippe) wants the same rich girl as Igby (Claire Danes). In case you couldn't tell, this movie is about rich white people behaving poorly, played by the best Hollywood has to offer.

When Igby gets kicked out of every prep school on the East Coast, he is sent to military school. He escapes and makes his way to New York City and talks his way into staying with his godfather's mistress, unbeknownst to his family.

While staying in the city, Igby gets a taste of colorful people (drug addicts), sex (with his godfather's junkie mistress played by Amanda Peet of "Saving Silverman") and gainful employment (drug dealing). Disillusionment never sounded like so much fun.

Along the way, he falls in love with the older Sookie (Claire Danes) but gets burned.

So, chapter one is basically "Catcher in the Rye," but Steers changes things up a bit. I mean, hey, "Catcher" didn't have a central love interest, and that's no good for the box office.

For the most part, the performances are excellent. Culkin plays the movie's brat prince with ease. It must be in his genes. Goldblum and Sarandon are both nearly caricatures, but they bring a surprising amount of depth to the characters and story. Unfortunately, Steers must have told Phillippe he was in "Cruel Intentions 3."

"Igby" waits until the back half of the movie to drop its heavy punches and leaves the audience emotionally reeling. Sarandon's death scene is possibly the most disturbing on-screen death of the year.

In the end, "Igby" is a good movie, but take its intellectuality with a grain of salt and Salinger.

Action film fails audience

Overdone, boring script wastes actors' talents

"I SPY"

Movie review By JJ Duncan

Hollywood has come up with another big-name, buddy-action movie to add to the already stale genre, making "I Spy" a horrible attempt to make some easy money.

Owen Wilson stars as the incredibly clumsy secret agent Alex Scott, who is trying to track down a stolen stealth fighter for the U.S. government.

The accident-prone spy isn't having too much luck. In fact, he killed his only source of information by triggering an avalanche with his cell phone.

Scott does know that the plane is now in the possession of international arms dealer Arnold Gundars (Malcolm McDowell).

He also knows that Gundars has a thing for boxing and will be at Kelly Robinson's (Eddie Murphy) upcoming fight in Budapest.

With this information, Scott develops a plan to pose as Robinson's assistant, get close to Gundars and steal back the jet.

After a call from George W. Bush, Robinson reluctantly agrees to go along with the mission and the two head for Hungary.

This movie has a strong basis.

"I Spy" was one of the most acclaimed and influential shows in the history of television, but all this movie is concerned with is making a quick buck by ripping off its title.

The script is full of overdone spy-movie gimmicks that generate absolutely no interest.

The immense talents of Wilson and Murphy are wasted in the worst roles since "Behind Enemy Lines" and "The Adventures of Pluto Nash."

You know something is very wrong when two of the funniest actors in cinema fail to draw even an occasional chuckle.

SEBELIUS | Commissioner calls for 'adequate' public education funding

2. What funding will you give to public education, K-12? What level of priority is this for you?

The next governor, along with legislators, community leaders, parents and citizens, must make education funding the state's top priority. Quality schools will equip our children with the skills necessary to compete and prosper in the 21st century and spur economic development throughout Kansas.

Jobs and businesses will stay in areas where children are guaranteed a quality education.

The recently completed school study provides a good target for "suitable education" funding in Kansas. I am committed to reaching the targeted funding level as quickly as possible and then adjusting the numbers annually in order to avoid past mistakes. Additionally, local districts should be allowed, within constitutional parameters, to enhance funding locally.

We must also address the fact that Kansas ranks 41st out of 50 states in teacher salaries.

As much as possible, new school dollars need to be directed to recruit, reward and retain quality teachers.

The next governor of Kansas must use the power of the office, the power of persuasion, and if necessary, the power of the veto, to ensure public education is funded adequately in every budget. That's the state's responsibility, and if the job is done, it reduces the pressure on local communities.

The funding of quality schools in Kansas may determine the economic future of our state in the 21st century. There is no higher priority for our tax dollars and no greater commitment for the next governor.

3. Are you willing to raise taxes to fund education? If not, how do you propose to get the needed money?

I believe it is inappropriate to discuss a tax increase until we have reviewed how our state government is run. It has been almost two decades since any review of state government was completed to look for waste and inefficiencies. Before taxes are considered, we owe it to all Kansans to ensure that they are getting what they pay for.

I have begun an in-depth look at government operations, and the day after the election will initiate an extensive review of state government looking for waste and inefficiency. This review will begin with the governor's office and include all state agencies and departments. I will also use the tools of the governor's office, including the veto, to make sure government spending is responsible and balanced.

4. With K-State being a land-grant university and many students concerned with agriculture, how will you help Kansas farmers survive?

There are currently many good efforts directed at rural development from several different agencies and departments in Kansas.

Unfortunately, there has been little coordination to direct and promote these efforts. Rural development activities have been transferred from the Department of Agriculture to other departments and state agencies. There is no longer a single, passionate voice for agriculture and rural Kansas.

As governor, I will re-establish a leadership role for the secretary of agriculture in all rural developmental efforts. This would include agricultural market promotion and value-added agriculture efforts that were transferred to the Kansas Department of Commerce and Housing. My secretary of agriculture will be a strong promoter of product agriculture. When raw agricultural products are exported from our state, Kansas loses the opportunity to add value to that raw material and a Kansas worker loses the opportunity for a better job.

We must work to increase our efforts to promote alternative products for agriculture. Products like ethanol and biodiesel are examples of value-added products that can help to increase revenue for Kansas agriculture producers. Alternative energy sources like wind energy are a great way to help invigorate the Kansas agriculture economy. While we live in a global economy, it is imperative that we work to keep any money from added value products in the pockets of Kansas citizens.

SHALLENBURGER Treasurer says he won't raise taxes

should allow local school districts to raise revenue locally for the purpose of enhancing their districts beyond the suitable level.

Most importantly, we must transfer needless administrative costs to where it works best - the classroom. We have to increase the amount we invest in classroom spending. Teachers' pay has to increase to a level that is competitive with other states and with the private sector.

3. Are you willing to raise taxes to fund education? If not, how do you propose to get the needed money?

I will not raise taxes for any purpose. As I mentioned before, we must identify and eliminate wasteful spending in Topeka. Instead of looking to the taxpayers for the answers to the budget shortfall, government must look within and have the courage to find a better way.

This can be done without harming K-12 education. As state treasurer, I reduced the taxpayer-funded portion of my budget by over 30 percent by eliminating waste.

The quality of service increased and the Legislature even added two new programs to the office - Learning Quest, the state's college savings plan, and the Agricultural Production Loan Program, which provides low-interest loans to Kansas farmers.

4. With K-State being a land-grant university and many students concerned with agriculture, how will you help Kansas farmers survive?

It is time that we invest in agriculture. As governor, I will hold an annual agricultural summit to discuss ways we can better the ag environment in Kansas. I would encourage you to visit my Web site for a detailed account of my plan.

SUNFLOWER SHOWDOWN | Wildcats hand Jayhawks worst loss in series history

quarterback sneak, and it so happened they handed the ball off in the endzone, and we were just all over them."

Up 2-0, K-State proceeded to tack on 28 more points in the quarter, most of which came off KU turnovers.

The Cats scored after the free kick following the safety, then capitalized on a mishandled snap by the Jayhawk punter, and a fumble by the Kansas quarterback Jonas Weatherbie.

All said, K-State amassed a little less than 200 yards of total offense for the quarter and had a 30-0 lead.

Fullback Travis Wilson said the start K-State got off to was about as good as a person can ask for.

"When we came out, we had a lot of intensity and just wanted to smack them in the mouth," he said. "We seemed to do that, and that helped us get a jump up in the game and get some points on the board."

And it only got worse for the Jayhawks in the second quarter.

K-State's offense added 13 more points to its already blow-out total before half-time, as the defense didn't allow Kansas to get past its own 40-yard line.

The Jayhawks settled for just 14 total yards and two first downs in the half.

Coach Bill Snyder said his team played very well to start the game.

"We played well on offense, played well on defense, played well on special teams. We played hard and played with emotion. The execution was good for the first half of the ballgame, and that's about all a coach can ask for," he said.

"I think our football team had a lot to do with it. Our football team played well. I know the University of Kansas, without their No. 1 quarterback, that makes a lot of difference in the game as well. But we still could have come out and laid an egg like we did in Baylor, but our youngsters chose not to, and I was extremely proud of them because of that."

With the No. 2s playing the majority of the second half, Snyder said they were trying to keep the game moving, while also executing their offense.

The No. 1 offense did have the first series of the third quarter and was able to punch it in for six when Darren Sproles scampered 26 yards for the score.

Sproles had 110 yards rushing, his fifth consecutive 100-yard game. He now has 969 yards for the year and sits in seventh place for most rushing yards by a K-State back in a single season.

Snyder said it was tough not to score at times because Kansas was surrendering the ball with regularity.

For the game, the Jayhawks had seven turnovers — four of which came in the second half. Two of those were deep in Kansas territory.

"There's not enough time to put your knee on the ground, and you don't want to do anything that would attempt to embarrass the other team,"

Snyder said. "That wasn't our intent, and we were playing everybody, so there's not a whole lot you can do."

"The thing that made it difficult was Kansas was turning the ball over so many times."

Although KU still leads series 61-34-5, the Cats have now won 10 straight.

Pierce said the atmosphere and storyline in which the blow-out took place made the win that much more memorable.

"Ten in a row was big, and in the 100th game was big," he said. "We've been watching film about the traditions of the game and how far the game has come along."

"For us to win, especially with a shutout on the defensive side, solidifies our position in the tradition."

VOLLEY Cats sweep ISU; win streak at 9

K-State will have to defend its streak again Wednesday against No. 21 Missouri in Columbia.

Fritz said she is pleased with where the team is.

"For the most part, this team is an extremely efficient team, so they can string points together," she said.

"It's about being efficient. It's about making good plays over time, and that's how you string points together. Then, on occasion, you have to make a great play."

Ted Pettibone, Reform

1. At K-State, library hours are being cut, tuition has been rising and faculty are experiencing hiring freezes. How much is higher education a priority to you? How will you ensure that funding for higher education doesn't hinder the quality of education?

It is a priority, but not something I would throw money at. I would want to come in and understand why we are having to raise tuition.

I don't think higher education is the issue that K-12 is. Before any money or cuts that need to be taken because of the gaping shortfall, we would want to make sure money was being spent responsibly.

2. What funding will you give to public education, K-12? What level of priority is this for you?

It is very important. There have been studies done that have indicated that we are not very good at getting the largest percentage of dollars into the classroom - that's a problem.

The next thing is when you look at Kansas in terms of the whole budget, what percent is spent on K-12. We have ranked in the top 10 the last three years. Are we spending these dollars effectively?

From a business background, that is the first avenue I would take. I would not throw money at public education until we understand how we are spending the money we have.

3. Are you willing to raise taxes to fund education? If not, how do you propose to get the needed money?

I wouldn't raise taxes. That is absolutely not an option. Not only would it hurt Kansans, but it would create resentment toward whatever was seen as the driving force behind that tax increase.

If we start raising taxes even further, I think it is going to impact the economy even more in Kansas.

4. With K-State being a land-grant university and many students concerned with agriculture, how will you help Kansas farmers survive?

Agriculture was the first born of all industry. It has been relegated to stepchild status.

I would want to give much more of an effort on rural Kansas in order to help towns diversify so that businesses are agriculturally related as well as manufacturally related so that people can afford to live and stay in rural Kansas.

Dennis Hawver, Libertarian

1. At K-State, library hours are being cut, tuition has been rising and faculty are experiencing hiring freezes. How much is higher education a priority to you? How will you ensure that funding for higher education doesn't hinder the quality of education?

I think higher education is very important. We are spending too much money building things on campus and too little money on educating college students. We need to stop building these huge, beautiful, expensive buildings and spend more money on getting the knowledge into the students' heads. I would work with classrooms and laboratories and physical facilities we have now and not build anything new. We are making the price of higher education even more expensive.

2. What funding will you give to public education, K-12? What level of priority is this for you?

Our current K-12 system is virtually a failure. It is putting money into facilities and overpaid administrators, when in reality we should have 95 percent of people that work for the school system in the classroom.

We should have students cleaning up the halls and classrooms and making the buildings clean and neat instead of having a $100,000 principal and an $80,000 assistant principal.

3. Are you willing to raise taxes to fund education? If not, how do you propose to get the needed money?

Under no circumstances would I raise taxes. As a matter of fact, my goal is to lower taxes so your parents would get to decide how they wanted to spend the money they earn.

4. With K-State being a land-grant university and many students concerned with agriculture, how will you help Kansas farmers survive?

It is kind of up to the farmers themselves. The farmers have gone into welfare class. They have been snookered into using chemicals - 20 to 30 percent of overhead goes to chemical companies.

I am not in favor of government, federal or state, doing anything for farmers. Just like I don't want the government to do anything for grocers or lawyers.

Federal/State office candidates

U.S. Senator

Steven Rosile, Libertarian

1. What is the biggest issue of your campaign?

The federal government needs to be reduced in size. They need to be reigned in. I would abolish income tax and downsize government. The income tax would be completely eliminated.

2. Why should college students care who is elected to this office?

Government takes so much of their wealth and rights, they better be concerned about government engulfing them completely. Young people should be very concerned how compensatory the government has become. Government isn't the solution - it's the problem.

George Cook, Reform

George Cook could not be reached for comment.

Pat Roberts, Republican

1. What is the biggest issue of your campaign?

It is important that we detect and deter acts of terrorism at home and abroad. It is important that universities like Kansas State be given the opportunity to contribute to the homeland security effort through federally funded research.

2. Why should college students care who is elected to this office?

Students who vote in federal elections become a partner in government. Voting is the best way to bring about change and make yourself heard. As we saw in the elections in 2000, every vote counts.

U.S. Representative, District 2

Dan Lykins, Democrat

1. What is the biggest issue of your campaign?

We should not put Social Security money in the stock market. The stock market has lost $5.5 trillion. If Social Security would have been in the stock market, it would have been bankrupt.

2. Why should college students care who is elected to this office?

What goes on in Washington directly affects K-State as far as student loans and grants that are directly affected by Congress. I understand what problems K-State faces, and I am there to fight.

Art Clack, Libertarian

1. What is the biggest issue of your campaign?

Government controls too much of our economy and therefore our lives. To make matters worse, government is very inefficient. It controls 50 percent of the economy and delivers 37 percent to the dollar.

2. Why should college students care who is elected to this office?

I met one college student who said, 'I don't care.' That attitude is going to get her taxed to death. If she doesn't care, then obviously they have permission to take more of their money.

Jim Ryn, Republican

Jim Ryn could not be reached for comment.

Secretary of State

David Haley, Democrat

1. What is the biggest issue of your campaign?

Increase voter turnout and participation. We have the lowest voter turnout in state history. I want to increase that.

2. Why should college students care who is elected to this office?

Remember the presidential election of 2000? It was the secretary of state who decided which methods of recording the vote - which would be counted and which wouldn't. I intend to bother the student body to participate more. I am constantly amazed that the lowest age group for voting is 35 and under.

Charles St-George, Reform

1. What is the biggest issue of your campaign?

The largest issue is regarding the voter election reform. The voter election reform bill is going to cost $3.8 billion dollars. Computerized voting is untested, and the data we have presently indicates there is no computer system that cannot be hacked.

2. Why should college students care who is elected to this office?

It is a statewide office that does have substantial responsibility to encourage voters to exercise their right to vote. The last primary in August, with 26-percent turnout, was the lowest turnout in history for the state of Kansas.

Ron Thornburgh, Republican

1. What is the biggest issue of your campaign?

There is the very important issue of implementing the federal election reform act.

I was the chief negotiator for the states with members of Congress, so that puts me in an ideal position to help implement what the law requires.

2. Why should college students care who is elected to this office?

For the same reason, they should care who is elected to every office. The one voice missing from America today is the young people. I will ensure that voice is heard.

Attorney General

Chris Biggs, Democrat

1. What is the biggest issue of your campaign?

Qualifications for the job. I have been a practicing attorney for almost 20 years and prosecutor of the year in the state of Kansas.

I have also been legislative chair of our state prosecutor association. I have the courtroom, management, legal and legislative experience for the job.

2. Why should college students care who is elected to this office?

The attorney general is a very powerful position. The attorney general enforces the law and writes legal opinions to interpret the law, which affects people in all aspects of their life potentially.

Phil Kline, Republican

1. What is the biggest issue of your campaign?

Our sentencing guidelines have become a tool for funding political projects like $100 million-plus Capitol renovations rather than as a tool for justice. I will work in partnership with local law enforcement to take this message to the legislature to ensure proper funding for law enforcement efforts and to make sure that violent criminals are kept behind bars rather than allowed to roam our streets.

2. Why should college students care who is elected to this office?

Every citizen in Kansas should care who serves as the next attorney general of our state. Crime has an effect on our lives on a daily basis. Having an attorney general with the ability to not only articulate a vision but see that that vision is carried out is vital to the well-being of our state.

State Treasurer

Sally Finney, Democrat

1. What is the biggest issue of your campaign?

My biggest issue is working to restore financial responsibility to the state government by being an advocate for sound fiscal policy in the state.

We have legislators that voted to increase the tax on food and milk because they said we needed it for health care and education but voted to put a statue on the Statehouse. I would work to inform citizens on these votes as they come up.

2. Why should college students care who is elected to this office?

One of the issues I am committed to dealing with is the marketing of credit cards to college and high school students. Another reason is, as the state treasurer, I will be an advocate for sound financial policy. It hits our pocket book. We ought to care who is elected.

Lynn Jenkins, Republican

1. What is the biggest issue of your campaign?

That state treasurer doesn't affect public policy or budget matters. It is about who you trust with the state's financial resources.

2. Why should college students care who is elected to this office?

The state treasurer has a chance to be a part of financial solutions by making investment choices. It has a direct impact on their pocketbook.

Commissioner of Insurance

Jim Garner, Democrat

1. What is the biggest issue of your campaign?

I am the candidate who is not taking money from the insurance industry. My opponent is. The job of the commissioner is to be a regulator, and I don't know how you can take money from them to fund your campaign. I think it is wrong.

2. Why should college students care who is elected to this office?

Everyone is a consumer of insurance. Kansans spend $10 billion a year on insurance. That's the entire state budget. Everyone who drives a car has to buy insurance. There are many reasons why it is important who has this office.

Sandy Praeger, Republican

1. What is the biggest issue of your campaign?

For me, it's about restoring balance and competition in the insurance market place. We have lost companies in Kansas, and it is critically important that Kansas consumers have some good choices.

2. Why should college students care who is elected to this office?

We are talking about your future. I think especially in the area of health insurance, we are seeing the premium going up and people losing coverage. While it's not a huge issue right now for a lot of college students, when they get out in the marketplace, you want to get a job that has coverage through the workplace.

That means having a commissioner that makes good decisions right now.

Local candidates

KS Representative, District 66

Sydney Carlin, Democrat

1. What is the biggest issue of your campaign?

What to do about the budget deficit in Kansas. I am going to support Kathleen Sebelius' top-to-bottom review of government. This is going to give us a chance to right-size government.

2. Why should college students care who is elected to this office?

They need to care because their tuition has gone up. Tuition should be used to enhance the quality of education. Instead, they had to use it to keep the university going. This amounts to a user fee on education rather than being paid for by the general public.

Reid Kapple, Libertarian

1. What is the biggest issue of your campaign?

Minimizing the government's role on all levels. Battling against the war on drugs. I believe drugs should be legal, and the government wastes too much money on a war they can't win.

2. Why should college students care who is elected to this office?

I think college students should care because it is their nation, and they should be concerned and know how the government is being run.

Russ Frey, Republican

1. What is the biggest issue of your campaign?

One is to get a balanced budget. The best we can do is hold harmless - try to stay at last year's funding levels even though K-12 has already taken a cut. How will we raise the money? Spending cuts and revenue enhancement.

2. Why should college students care who is elected to this office?

It is the beginning of your lifetime opportunity to participate in democracy, whether it is who gets elected where you are going to school or who gets elected back home.

KS Representative, District 67

Tom Hawk, Democrat

1. What is the biggest issue of your campaign?

The biggest issue is always the state budget. The state is projected to be in the hole a billion dollars. The sidebar issue is how are we going to come to a consensus on our priorities whether you are talking K-12 or the university.

2. Why should college students care who is elected to this office?

The two house of representative seats are probably the most influential seats. I have been interested in how we can make K-State better for in excess of 35 years. I am making a commitment to my full-time to being a legislator.

Roger Reitz, Republican

1. What is the biggest issue of your campaign?

The No. 1 issue is management of the budget so we can get it balanced.

Everything else falls into place after that. Education is going to be paramount. But other things are equally important. The health-care costs have grown on exponentially so that take-home pay is going to get less and less.

That will be all right one year, but if it continues to escalate, there will be road rage toward health care. People ought to be very concerned.

2. Why should college students care who is elected to this office?

The only reason I got into the political process is the fulfillment that comes from taking a consensus of people and move it into a concept.

They should be alerted to that sense of fulfillment early on and participate in it if they possibly can.

Suspect arraigned on assault charges

Court enters innocent plea for graduate student

By Micah Hawkinson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Akkawit Aimdilokwong, graduate student in chemical engineering, was arraigned Monday at the Riley County District Court for allegedly assaulting a woman in late August. The court entered a plea of innocent.

Aimdilokwong, 26, a convicted sex offender, was most recently arrested Oct. 25 for sexual battery and probation violation. Other incidents include an April 17 arrest for assault at the K-State Student Union.

During Monday's hearing the court signed two no contact orders and granted continuances of charges, including two motions to revoke probation.

According to Aimdilokwong's attorney's statement to the court, one of the defense's main reasons for requesting the continuances was to enable Aimdilokwong's father to arrive from Asia.

Riley County Assistant Attorney Valerie Peterson has been reviewing other sexual assault cases, which could result in additional charges against Aimdilokwong.

The next trial will be at 2:30 p.m. Nov. 12 in the Division II courtroom of the Riley County Courthouse.

Residents ready for tax vote

Sales tax increase's fate to be determined today

By Amy Preston
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After weeks of controversy and heated debates, Manhattan residents will have the final say in a sales tax increase as they enter the polls today.

If passed, the half-cent tax increase will replace the current sales tax when it expires, Bernie Hayden, city director of finance, said.

The current sales tax is paying off the construction of the Law Enforcement Center and will expire in late 2003 or early 2004.

"This sales tax is a continuation of the Law Enforcement Center tax," Hayden said. "Right now, when the half-cent sales tax expires, the new tax would start where the other one finished."

In addition, the half-cent increase will go toward both the city's economic developments and county improvements of roads and bridges.

However, because the tax includes both the county and the city, many conflicts have stemmed from the proposal.

"The controversy stems from the fact that in order to make that palatable to the county, they would have to give approval to those funds outside of the county," Hayden said.

Increasing the Economy

Lyle Butler, executive director for the Manhattan Area Chamber of Commerce, said the increased sales tax will be

K-State Police released a list of five university-related sex-offenders to fulfill a requirement of the Federal Campus Sex Crime Prevention Act on Monday.

Employee James McAllister and students Akkawit Aimdilokwong, Mishal Al-Hawwas, Brian Ardis and Kelly Harris are on the sex-offender list.

The list provides the names of offenders, who can be found on the Kansas Bureau of Investigation Web site, www.accesskansas.org.

McAllister is a K-State custodial specialist. He was convicted of battery. K-State records indicate he has worked at the university since August 2000.

Aimdilokwong, graduate student in chemistry, was convicted of sexual battery.

Al-Hawwas, freshman in business administration, was convicted of sexual battery.

Ardis, junior in aviation management at K-State-Salina, was convicted of aggravated indecent liberties with a child.

Harris, graduate student in mathematics, was convicted of sexual battery.

"There's a federal law for the list to be made available through the KBI to the university," Robert Mellgren, campus police captain, said.

He said the sex-offender list is an ongoing list that has been kept by the Kansas Bureau of Investigation.

According to www.campusafety.org, the Campus Sex Crimes Prevention Act was enacted Oct. 28, 2000. The act's purpose was to provide names of convicted, registered sex-offenders enrolled as students at institutions of higher education, or working or volunteering on campus.

The act took effect Oct. 28, 2002. According to the Web site, changes required that state procedures ensure that this registration information is promptly made available to law enforcement agencies with jurisdiction where the institutions of higher education are located and that it is entered into the appropriate state records or data systems.

Mellgren said students can come to campus police in Edwards Hall and ask for the sex-offender list to see if there are offenders in the surrounding community. Information and photographs for registered sex-offenders are also available online at www.accesskansas.org.

Mellgren said that although the list provides names, students can never be too careful.

"Sex offenses are listed in the KBI, which tries to segregate them out to identify with different universities," he said. "But people move around and it's hard to keep an accurate account. Once the list is posted, it could be accurate today but it could change tomorrow."

CRAZY CATS

Homecoming Week begins with friendly battle

By Crystal Welborn
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The scene was like one from NBC's "Fear Factor." The contestants entered the arena. There was mud on the ground and dust in the air. They were ready and waiting, but they weren't competing for cash — only bragging rights.

Monday night was the annual Crazy Cat Kickoff, a competition during which residence hall dwellers participate in a series of competitive activities to earn points. The points go toward the grand total of their point earnings for Homecoming Week.

The Haymaker-West Hall team walked away with the top spot and the bragging rights after Julie Kim, freshman in business, became a human sundae.

"I'm icky, gooey, sticky and cold, but I loved being a sundae. It was fun, and we rock," she said as she and her teammates screamed in excitement.

More than 100 contestants competed in activities ranging from bobbing for vegetables — in which coming up with an onion gained more points than coming up with a carrot — to a penny dig, which required contestants to find and remove a penny in a bowl of flour using only a drinking straw.

Muslim students declare commitment to faith

Unwavering beliefs source of strength for Islamic followers

Prayer, five times a day.
Fasting, one month a year.
Pilgrimage to the Holy Land, once in a lifetime.

Mohammad Al-Deeb follows these ideals through his life, but he says they are meaningless without the fifth pillar of his Islamic faith, declaration of faith.

"I bear witness that there is no god but Allah. I bear witness that Muhammad is his servant and messenger."

Al-Deeb, graduate student in entomology, has been true to his declaration of faith even before he officially made it. He was born and raised in Syria, a dominantly Islamic country, by devout Muslim parents.

Al-Deeb kept the lessons of Islam close to him when he arrived in the United States in 1997 to attend K-State and when he has gone through every other transition in his life.

"Islam is a way of life," Al-Deeb said. "I didn't find a major change in my faith [when I came to America]. I live as a Muslim wherever I go."

Finding faith

This is the first of five stories on different faiths present on the K-State campus. Watch the Collegian every Tuesday to learn more about what these religions mean to the students who practice them.

Though he never changed in his faith, Al-Deeb did recall having to adapt to new surroundings.

"It's challenging whenever you live in a country different in language, religion and culture," he said. "You have to make

Structural damage totals $20,000 in Sunday fire on Casement Road

Fire department officials released more information Monday about a fire that blazed Sunday night at 2306 Casement Road.

Structural damage to the residence totaled $20,000, and personal property damage equaled $15,000, said Don Francis, assistant fire chief at the Manhattan Fire Department.

The fire started when the wooden panel in the floor underneath the fireplace overheated and caught on fire, Francis said. The four residents were home at the time. None of the four were injured, Francis said. Francis did not release the residents' names.

The American Film Institute's board of trustees selected 59-year-old Robert De Niro to receive the 31st AFI Life Achievement Award.

De Niro is set to accept the honor June 12 at the Kodak Theatre in Hollywood, site of the annual Academy Awards.

De Niro won a supporting-actor Oscar in 1975 for playing young gangster Vito Corleone in "The Godfather Part II" and a best-actor Oscar in 1981 for his portrayal of boxer Jake La Motta in "Raging Bull."

Justin Timberlake says Michael Jackson has been a big influence on his sound, but not the only one.

Timberlake, the 'N Sync star whose debut solo album, "Justified," is due today, has been tagged with imitating Jackson because of a few wardrobe choices and big appearances with the King of Pop.

Timberlake, whose breakup with Britney Spears this year was widely reported in the entertainment media, said he tweaked a few songs on "Justified" to throw off people who might try to learn about his personal life from his music.

MUSLIM | Students share Islamic beliefs, correct stereotypes of religion

daily adjustments."

For example, when Al-Deeb eats at a restaurant, he has to check if the food is free of all pork products before ordering. He never had to worry about this in his Islamic homeland.

The Muslim Student Association at K-State helps students through these adjustments, MSA president Ersel Obuz, said.

"Even though the environment is very tolerant, we need to be together to really feel the essence of our religion," Obuz, doctorate candidate in food science, said.

Speaking for the MSA, Obuz added that they are glad to be part of the Manhattan community.

With the events of Sept. 11 resulting in negative attention for Islam, Al-Deeb was not one to shy away from his beliefs. He describes the incidents as misrepresentations of Islam and takes every opportunity to correct any misconceived ideas people might have about his religion.

"I am proud to be a Muslim," Al-Deeb said. "After Sept. 11, I didn't hide, I stood up and talked. I know there is nothing to be ashamed of."

Al-Deeb also explained that the mistreatment of women in Middle Eastern and Asian countries has nothing to do with the Islam religion but is the result of thousand-year-old cultures and traditions.

Mohamed Awadallah, doctoral candidate in electrical engineering and a Muslim, encourages people who are interested in Islam to "find the right source and not rely on someone who might be misinformed about Islam."

"Talk to a practicing Muslim or read a translation of the Quran," he said.

Al-Deeb described the religion of Islam as practical and simple, but not shallow. To share the basic ideas of Islam, Al-Deeb related it to the college setting, comparing life to taking a test.

"The Quran is the required text for the test," Al-Deeb said. "Muhammad is the teacher. He makes the book clear and is a perfect example of living your life as a Muslim."

Al-Deeb added that it is important to know that Muhammad was just a man, which means that truly following the Quran is humanly possible because the prophet Muhammad achieved it in his lifetime.

This is why Muslims model their lives after Muhammad to pass the test of life, he says.

"By the time we die, that is it - test over," Al-Deeb said. "Then, at the time of judgment, our good deeds are weighed against our bad deeds, and we will live forever in paradise or the hell fire."

The good deeds, Al-Deeb

Learning about Islam

■ What is Islam?

Islam means submission, or submission to the will of God. It is the characteristic attitude of members of the Muslim faith.

Muslim (also spelled Moslem) is based on the same Arabic root as Islam and means one who submits to God, or a believer in Islam.

■ Concept of "God" in Islam

Allah is the Supreme Being, the one and only God.

■ Holy book:

The Quran (also spelled Koran, Alkoran, etc.) is the holy scripture revealed by Allah to Muhammad. The word Quran means readings or recitations.

said, are part of the very detailed moral code of Islam that serves as a general outline for all areas of life: how to deal with a neighbor or a spouse, how to eat and how to drink.

As strict as the religion might seem to some, Al-Deeb

■ Most basic teachings:

As described by Prophet Muhammad: Islam is built on five pillars:

1. The declaration (bearing witness) that there is no god but God (Allah) and that Muhammad is his messenger
2. The establishment of prayers
3. The payment of the Zakat (alms)
4. Observation of the fast of Ramadan
5. The Hajj (pilgrimage to Mecca) if affordable

The Kaaba, in Mecca, is a symbol of unity for all Muslims, said Mohammad Al-Deeb, graduate student in entomology. Muslims face Kaaba during prayer and travel to the one-room building on their pilgrimage.

again expressed the practicality of Islam.

"In Islam, all desires are controlled," he said. "We were created to worship God as humans, meaning we are not asked too much or to live as saints."

Student leaders, officials to set example by voting

By James Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student Body President Zac Cook has not voted in every election. He didn't see a point in it.

"I literally had a my-vote-doesn't-count attitude," Cook said.

Cook's parents never really pushed him to vote, he said, and most of the elections in his hometown were lopsided victories for the majority party.

But since the student body elections last spring, and with his involvement with state and local legislatures, Cook said he has realized the importance of voting.

He said he has been surprised recently by the amount of work a motivated group can accomplish, even if it is a political minority. The school board race in his hometown of Plains, Kan., is a good example of that, he said. A small group of people has a solid agenda and has gained momentum going into the election.

"My dad didn't want me to change from home," Cook said. "My parents had been content with me staying at home to vote, but when you spend three-quarters of your time here, the Manhattan elections become important."

Cook said he plans to stay in Manhattan after graduation, so registering here was only a matter of time.

Student Body Vice President Todd Kohman said he has been an active voter, regularly voting in local, state and national elections. He said seeing his parents take interest in voting inspired him to do the same.

"They didn't really push me to do it," Kohman said. "I just did it because I wanted to, I guess."

Kohman and Student Senate Chair John O'Hara both changed their registration from Saline County to Riley County within the last two months.

"I've been a part of this community for four years," Kohman said, "and I haven't had a say in how it's run. I'm not in Salina as much, so it made sense for me to register here."

According to the Saline County Clerk's office, Kohman and O'Hara both remained registered there, as well. The Riley County Clerk had no record of Cook being registered, but Cook said he had the proof right in front of him.

"I've got the card right here," Cook said. "I hope they

TO THE POINT Students should exercise right to effect change

Today is election day. We have heard all the candidates voice their opinions over the issues for the past several months, and today is the day to choose the most qualified candidates for the positions.

Remember that people age 18 to 22 are underrepresented in the voting booths.

It is unfortunate that many young people believe that their votes do not matter, or that voting does not directly affect them.

In reality, college-age voters not only always matter, but are key to this year's most important topics.

Many of the issues being debated among Kansas politicians directly affect students and higher education. Budget problems at the state level affect regents institutions like K-State, and sales tax increases affect all citizens – including students.

We encourage every registered K-State student to take the extra time to go to the polls and vote today.

If you're not sure where to go, visit the Riley County Web site at www.co.riley.ks.us.

The only way to make sure that your voice is heard is to cast your ballot.

Voting gives you a say in what goes on in the government, so make sure your voice is heard today.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

ON THE PROWL

Sniper on campus 'kills' 10; leaves campus in shock

A mass of unsuspecting victims: that's what I think of walking around K-State during the past few days.

My name is Gabriel Hughes. I'm the K-State sniper.

It's been nearly two weeks since one of the worst serial killing sprees on record ended in Washington, D.C. While the capture of the alleged sniper continues to coat the newspapers with the unraveling of information, city residents are steadily building back their securities and moving on with their daily lives.

That's in Washington, D.C. Twelve hundred miles away in Manhattan, Kan., little changed when the shootings started, and little has changed now.

Inspired by the Washington sniper, I decided to go on a killing spree of my own. Armed with a tape recorder in the pocket of my leather jacket, I set out across campus, searching for victims. My spree covered five days beginning with the day after the capture of the sniper and ending the following Tuesday. In all, I amassed 10 victims.

The response I received was a little more shocking to even me than I had expected. The students, and even the few teachers to whom I had said, "You have just been shot," gave me looks of surprise and words of shock.

Despite the surprise of most, none of the people I stopped and talked to had considered the possibility of such a random act on the K-State campus. I was able to change a few minds, but not all of them.

The victims I chose were mostly students. I tried to approach teachers and adults, but they seemed the least humored by what I was trying to do.

Apparently, a tape recorder can be as deadly as a gun.

I found most of my victims walking alone. Twice I selected them in pairs, but only if there was no one else around. I generally stayed away from the cover of trees, under the shadow of a tall campus building, where a sniper might loom, because I didn't want anyone else to see what I was doing.

A couple of times, I tried to select a victim in a parking lot. However, parking security became curious as to the nature of my standing around.

I learned that being a sniper is not easy.

My hours were between 4 p.m. and 6 p.m., when the population was a little less dense. Statistically, serial killers tend to stay within their own racial lines. I didn't choose victims according to gender or race, although only one was a minority.

Even after being selected, many continued to shake their heads and said that I hadn't changed their minds at all, or perhaps just a little. A few were even annoyed that I would stop them.

Aside from the select few, the number that had never stopped to think about it before, despite how serious the issue, surprised me.

We seem to isolate ourselves in what is familiar. If something does not directly affect our routine or livelihood, we feign ignorance, most often unknowingly, because frankly, ignorance is bliss.

That ignorance can make us desensitized and unaware.

Can you name any one of the victims in the sniper shooting? Did you ever read the list of victims that died in the Sept. 11 attacks?

I hope I've been able to change your mind about a few things. Even if you were not one of the persons I approached on campus, perhaps the headline was enough to catch your attention. Reducing ignorance, by putting ourselves in the situation, can reduce uncertainty.

CAMPUS FOURUM | 395-4444

The Collegian is endorsing Sebelius? Well, I guess I know which way I'll be voting. Go, Shallenburger.

Note to Tim Shallenburger: You can't support higher education when you never received one.

This weekend, I had sex with a sergeant in the Marine Corps. Oh, yeah.

All you strong women should get in the kitchen and start making me some pies.

I guess it's a requirement that my geology lab teacher cuss every day, because today he dropped the f-bomb, and last week he said a naughty expletive for "poop" seven times.

You know what sucks? When you spend $65 on a pair of dozen roses and then you find out they're her least favorite kind. Some people should be more appreciative.

Whichever guy was driving around in his car wearing a helmet looked cool.

To the Tri Delt who took my pack of condoms: I know which one of you did it, so beware.

To the facilities people: Learn to let go. We don't need green grass in November.

What do you do when everyone in the house hates your roommate, and she refuses to move out?

All greeks are phonies. By the way, I'm calling this in from a sorority kitchen.

My wife just cut the eyeballs out of a stuffed turtle. Is that weird?

My girlfriend just admitted that women are lousy drivers. How cool is that?

If you don't vote, you're not a patriotic American, no matter how many flags you wave. Vote today.

Go to the polls and vote. If you're over 18 years old, you should vote. If something goes wrong with the government, don't blame the government, blame yourselves.

Nurturing occupations deserve salary increases, respect of peers

If you ask a child "What is the most important job in the world?" you can expect a predictable answer like a lawyer, doctor or politician. What you wouldn't expect is for the child to respond with the answer of stay-at-home mom or kindergarten teacher.

Western society has a very clear idea about which occupations are important and which are not. The positions commonly thought of as important have certain qualities.

They are associated with advanced education, power, prestige, wealth and masculinity. But is merit accurately being reflected in these practices?

The answer is no. Positions associated with nurturing and traditional ideas of femininity are not valued highly. We undermine the importance of the people who directly care for the more vulnerable members of society, while inflating the importance of people who are individualistic and only work toward their own gain. This reflects an underlying bias in conventional ideas about gender.

NASRINA BURNETT

Before the feminist movement, men and women had very specific occupational roles.

Women maintained the home and cared for the family, while men worked and earned a living. Basically, women nurtured and men conquered. Today, the increased number of women receiving an education and entering the workforce has caused a change.

When women first began to infiltrate the workforce, they were confined to positions that were deemed "appropriate" and "ladylike." This meant primarily nursing, teaching or secretarial positions. Over the years, women have advanced, but the positions that are still seen as women's work continue to be underpaid and undervalued.

I'm not simply saying that women do not receive the salaries they deserve, although it's true. My claim applies to both men and women who have chosen positions that directly nurture the members of our society, who require such assistance. At the moment, there just happen to be more women than men who have chosen these roles.

However, these men and women are not receiving the salaries or respect they deserve.

If we want to think of our society as merit based, then we must ask if people are receiving salaries that reflect the merit of their work. Everyone talks about how underpaid teachers are, especially those who work with the youngest and most impressionable age groups.

Nursing home employees are another example of an extremely underpaid group. They do difficult work, care for the senior members of our society, work long hours and receive very little monetary compensation or respect.

It amazes me to think that advertising executives are paid millions to create new ways to dupe the American public into buying things they do not need, while the people we entrust our children and elders to are making barely enough to support their own families.

The root of the monetary inequity is found in the attitudes about these occupations. How often is the stay-at-home parent considered truly successful?

The only way to rectify this situation is to make an effort to change our attitudes about nurturing roles. If a friend expresses his or her desire to one day be a full-time parent, do not lament the waste of his or her undergraduate degree.

Don't assume that people who can't do, teach. If they didn't teach, nobody would be able to do anything. Value the people in the behind-the-scenes support systems who allow those in the limelight to shine.

Bill to improve Fort Riley awaiting final approval

By Amy Preston
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After the approval of a $68 million bill to improve Fort Riley, the bill is now being processed and is in its second phase.

The Military Construction Appropriations Act was approved by Congress in October and is currently waiting for authorization, Christie Vanover, a Fort Riley spokeswoman, said.

"Although the appropriations have been approved, the authorization has not been," she said. "It's not locked in solid that these will definitely be happening."

When authorized, the bill would allow Fort Riley to upgrade in a number of areas, including $41 million for a national guard maintenance facility and new barracks on the Infantry Drive East.

"The facility will upgrade equipment indoors," Vanover said. "It will help the prolonged life of equipment and in turn saves the taxpayers' money."

However, while the Fort Riley appropriations bill passed, Congress denied a Manhattan airport expansion request.

"There were some differences from the House and the Senate side," said John Armbrust, head of military issues for the Manhattan Area Chamber of Commerce.

If the expansion request had passed, Armbrust said, Fort Riley would have benefited.

"With the expansion, there would be more airplanes to land for deployments and maior exercise, and they would be able to fly out of Fort Riley instead of going to Topeka," he said.

Although the request was denied, the airport expansion will be a topic of discussion for the 2008 fiscal year. Armbrust and local officials will be working to move this date up.

"We've already started to discuss how we'll approach it next year," he said. "We just have to work with them and see what other priorities there are and see how it fits in the overall picture."

While city officials will be working with the state on the airport expansion, Fort Riley is concentrating on the future of the bill and the additional request of an Urban Operations Combined Arms Collective Training Facility.

The facility, which would allow soldiers to train in an urban-like environment, has been approved in its first phase and has moved to the second.

"This will be a facility where they can do urban-style training, like a village complex with a residential and business district," she said. "Soldiers will train in an urban environment, since not all of their battles are fought in the field."

With the approval of the appropriations bill, Fort Riley officials are hoping not only to benefit their soldiers, but surrounding communities as well.

"This helps build morale, and obviously if our soldiers are better taken care of, our community is better," Vanover said.

Media critic speaks out about industry's practices, judgement

By Rogie Dorpinghaus
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The news media need to let readers make their own assumptions, a speaker said Monday.

Norman Solomon, who used to work in the mainstream media, now challenges mainstream practices as a media critic.

On Monday evening, Solomon, a syndicated columnist, spoke in Forum Hall to the public on "Media and Democracy: The Unfulfilled Promise."

The Lou Douglas Lecture Series brought Solomon, who lives in San Francisco, Calif., to K-State.

The event was co-sponsored by UFM Community Learning Center and the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications.

"Describe what happens — give the reader the chance to make their own assumptions," Solomon said.

Solomon made an impression on Danya Morris, junior in public relations.

"He proposed a lot of good questions that typically you don't hear," Morris said after attending the speech.

She said the principles of critical thinking and challenging what the mainstream media state are two concepts she will take home from Solomon's speech.

"He's a very effective speaker in his delivery and in his insight to different areas that I didn't think about before," she said.

In his speech, Solomon used KKSU-AM 580, "the voice of Kansas State University," which used to be a university-owned radio station but is now commercially owned, as an example of large corporations taking control of smaller businesses.

is considered retaliation. "The Afghanistan villagers who were killed were just as innocent as those who went to work on Sept. 11," he said.

Gavin Heathcock, senior in political science and marketing, said he wished he could have written down some of Solomon's speech.

"It was absolutely fabulous," he said. "He didn't only attack the media — he attacked the whole problem that media is, respondent to ratings."

Solomon concluded his speech by reminding students, that the future is theirs.

"History is not something consumed — it is made all the time by what we do and don't do," he said. "In part, what happens in the future is up to you."

Baseball needs makeover

NFL's marketing tactics could help revamp game

NICK BRATKOVICH

Perception, in sports, is everything.

Take a look around you. The whole thing is a giant marketing scheme, from the TV programing to Terrell Owen's endzone autograph sessions.

How can the NFL be so good at it, and Major League Baseball be so horrible?

Just look at the two sports' championships, the Super Bowl and the World Series.

The Super Bowl traditionally is one of the worst football games played all year.

For a stretch in the 1990s, you could just put 50 bucks on the NFC and collect your cash the next day.

It was like betting on K-State to beat KU. It was no question.

Granted, that is changing somewhat. The last few Super Bowls were OK.

Still, if the games traditionally are so horrible, why does everyone watch?

The commercials.

Commercials, which advertisers pony up big dollars to run, are a huge revenue stream for the games. The marketing scheme is there. Half the audience is just watching to see what Pepsi has rolled out that year. Each year, they set record ratings with a sub-par game and cool commercials.

So why can't baseball do the same thing? For the 2002 World Series, ratings were the lowest they have ever been. Ironically, it was one of the best World Series played in recent memory.

It all comes down to marketing.

In 2002, MLB did a poor job of promoting itself. Instead, all it did was tell fans how much the game sucked and threatened to shut the game down. You probably shouldn't expect good ratings for a series that culminated a season filled with so much angst.

When you have labor strife, steroid allegations and players having to defend their sexuality to the New York news media, what type of ratings can you expect?

Fans were just happy to get the year over with.

This has to change. Baseball will not survive if it doesn't. We will have the World Series on Pay-Per-View television. That would truly destroy the game. It's time to let fans enjoy the game they grew up loving.

Here is what baseball can do in the future. As usual, I am biased toward the Kansas City Royals. A few of these items pertain to baseball in Kansas City.

1. Stop promoting the game as the pastime

Today, nobody has time for the past. That stigma probably annoys people who hated the game as children. Besides, when you have home run records being shattered, and players who are arguably better than ever, it's time to promote these guys. No other game ties itself to the past as much. You never hear the NFL talk about the legends of

Rowing team shuts down Kansas

Cats claim Showdown crown for 1st time in 6 years

By Brent Gray
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State shut out intrastate rival Kansas 88-0 this weekend. The football team out-matched the Jayhawks 64-0 on the gridiron, but before the game even kicked off, the Cats already held a 24-0 advantage over the Jayhawks.

That's because the women's rowing team had already shut the Jayhawks out for the first time in the six-year history of the Sunflower Showdown, winning all five races.

"We had a very strong team performance this weekend," Coach Jenny Hale said. "When you look at all the boats, every single one of them did great."

Hale said the squad exceeded her expectations and will head into the spring season on a high note.

The Cats will not compete again until March 9 but have plenty to work on until then, Hale said.

"We will just try to stay out on the water for as long as possible," Hale said. "We will mix up some of the novice and varsity and let them get some time together."

The Cats rowed head-to-head against the Jayhawks in the Sunflower Showdown, which is similar to what the Cats will face this spring.

"This was a good weekend," Hale said. "That was a good

Quarterback Eli Roberson stiff-arms Kansas' Johnny McCoy in the first half of Saturday's shutout of the Jayhawks. Roberson is second on the team in rushing with 609 yards and averages 4.9 yards per run.

Roberson gets groove back against Jayhawks, shows consistency in limited time against KU

By Sean Purcell
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Two weeks ago against Baylor, quarterback Eli Roberson described his performance as "flat."

Flat indeed. Roberson completed just seven of 17 passes for 54 yards. He also threw a pick and was sacked once.

But Saturday was a different story for the junior QB.

"I was really off against Baylor, and my team, they never gave up on me," Roberson said. "One of the things I wanted to do was come out and throw the ball a little bit better, which I did."

Roberson completed his first five passes on the afternoon, finishing the opening quarter five-for-five, for 97 yards. Roberson would play the rest of the half and one series of the second half before relinquishing duties to Marc Dunn.

But it was a job well done. K-State was up 50-0, and Roberson's statistics showed a marked improvement from the previous week.

Roberson was eight for 13 for 139 yards on the day, but what impressed offensive coordinator Ron Hudson was the consistency shown by his quarterback.

"He threw the ball accurately. We had the one drop, but otherwise he had a real solid day, almost 200 yards. That's all you are going to ask of the guy," Hudson said. "You saw him executing the option, not fumbling, and getting us in some nice schemes."

"He did that against a team that is struggling and that's what he should do. So we feel he is getting better."

Coach Bill Snyder said that after the Baylor game, he was disappointed with Roberson's play, but not discouraged.

Every QB has a tough game, he said, and it was good to see Roberson respond against Kansas.

5 for 5

Eli Roberson completed his first five passes in Saturday's game against KU.

- 3rd and 5 from KS 30 — Roberson to Taco Wallace, 16 yards
- 1st and 10 from mid-field — Roberson to Wallace, 40 yards
- 2nd and 2 from KU 19 — Roberson to James Terry, 19 yards, TD
- 1st and 10 from KS 32 — Roberson to Darren Sproles, 5 yards
- 3rd and 3 from KS 39 — Roberson to Travis Wilson, 17 yards

"It's not that I or anybody else doubts that he is capable of doing it, and can do it, and has done it in the past," Snyder said. "So it's not the first time he has done it, but yes, it was good to see him throw the ball on the money a good portion of the time."

Roberson said it was critical for the offense to come out and make a statement on Saturday because it was starting to get the label of an unproductive scoring machine.

Granted, it was against Kansas, but they did what they were supposed to do,

Cross country disappointed with poor finish at Big 12 Championships

By Joel Reichenberger
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Amy Mortimer and Mathew Chesang couldn't do it all.

The duo earned All-Big 12 honors at this weekend's Big 12 Championships in Columbia, Mo., on Saturday, but the women's team finished seventh and the men 10th.

"We weren't so hot," Coach Randy Cole said. "We didn't place as good as I had hoped."

But Cole said the overall team performance should not detract from Mortimer's and Chesang's accomplishments. It was Mortimer's fourth straight All-Conference nod and the first for Chesang.

"Making All-Conference is definitely a great achievement," Cole said.

Mortimer finished ninth in the race but spent much of the course running in the lead group. She topped out in second place before she began to fall back, Cole said.

He said that with about one mile to go, Mortimer began to slip back, and ended a well-run race with a disheartening finish.

"Amy ran a smart race," he said. "But she hit a real bad spot with a mile to go, and wasn't able to finish it off."

Cole said Mortimer reported that

1-MINUTE DRILL

K-State Sports Information

Women's Basketball | Cats picked No. 5

The K-State women's basketball team received the highest preseason ranking in school history Monday when the Associated Press ranked the Wildcats No. 5 in its preseason Top 25 poll.

The last time K-State appeared in the AP preseason poll was Nov. 18, 1984, at the ranking of No. 9. The Wildcats have received a preseason ranking by AP four other times in school history - 1983 (No. 11), 1982 (No. 15), 1980 (No. 16) and 1979 (No. 19).

K-State will play six teams and possibly seven in the AP preseason poll during the 2002-03 season. The Wildcats might play No. 6 Stanford in the Cardinal Tournament on Nov. 30; No. 7 Texas Tech on March 6; No. 11 Texas on Jan. 25; No. 22 Oklahoma on Feb. 1 and No. 23 Iowa State on Jan. 15 and 29. Other Wildcat opponents receiving votes were Colorado and Ball State.

• • •

Tennis | K-State downs Iowa State

The K-State tennis team swept Iowa State on Saturday in six doubles matches in the Wildcat Doubles Invitational at the Cottonwood Racquet Club.

The Wildcat doubles team of junior Hayley McIver and sophomore Andrea Cooper beat Elizabeth Chermel and Courtney Leese, 8-3; Charlotte Ljungkrantz and Suzanne Rutten, 8-2; and Tara Goedjen and Ljungkrantz, 8-0.

K-State's other doubles team of senior Petra Sedmajerova and freshman Jessica Simosa beat Goedjen and Rutten, 8-0; Chermel and Leese, 8-3; and Leese and Rutten, 8-3.

The invitational originally was scheduled for Saturday and Sunday, but Colorado was unable to attend due to weather. Sunday's matches have been canceled.

• • •

Volleyball | Team cracks top 25

On the strength of a nine-match winning streak, the K-State women's volleyball team returned to the AVCA/USA Today Top 25 poll on Monday for the first time since Sept. 9 at No. 25.

The Wildcats, who have been receiving votes for the last two weeks, received four more votes (134-130) to wrestle the No. 25 spot from last week's No. 25 Michigan State.

The Associated Press

NFL | Broncos sign special teamers

The Denver Broncos continued their overhaul of special teams Monday, signing tight end Mike Leach and wide receiver Herb Haygood.

Leach, in his third season, will take over long-snapping duties. Leach played in 19 games with Tennessee his first two seasons, mostly on special teams. He was waived by Chicago in August.

Haygood, Denver's fifth-round draft pick this year, will likely take over kickoff duties for Kevin Kasper, who was released last week. Haygood had been on Denver's practice squad.

Last week, Denver released punter Tom Rouen, who played 10 years with the team.

MLB | Hinske, Jennings voted AL, NL Rookies of the year, respectively

Eric Hinske and Jason Jennings were worried about jobs, not prizes. Now they have both.

Hinske was voted American League Rookie of the Year on Monday and Jennings was voted the National League honor as the Baseball Writers' Association of America began announcing its awards for the 2002 season.

Hinske, acquired by Toronto from Oakland last December in the deal that sent closer Billy Koch to the Athletics, won the Blue Jays' third-base job in spring training and hit .279 with 24 homers and 84 RBIs. He got 19 of 28 first-place votes and nine seconds to finish with 122 points.

Jennings, 24, went 16-8 with a 4.52 ERA and became the first Colorado player to win the award. Jennings got 27 firsts and five seconds for 150 points.

PAINTING REALITY

Artist strives to preserve memory of family farms in portraits

"Clifford's Oliver," an oil pastel by Moseman, is on display at the Strecker-Nelson Art Gallery on Poyntz Avenue.

Moseman's work has been featured in many publications, including "The Best of Portrait Painting," by North Light Books and the article "Master Painters of the World" in "International Artist" magazine. His show, "Mark Moseman: Contemporary American Realism" will be on display at the Strecker-Nelson gallery until Jan. 15, 2003.

"Jumping Jack," a pastel painting by Moseman, is also on display at the Strecker-Nelson Art Gallery.

Moseman's parents were victims of the farm crises of the 1980s, influencing the subject matter of the paintings he would later create. He decided to take up art as more than a hobby in 1993 at 49.

Moseman became an agrarian painter so people wouldn't forget what he calls the endangered species of farmers.

"Take It Home," an oil pastel by M.L. Moseman, is also on display at the Strecker-Nelson Art Gallery.

Moseman was born in rural Nebraska and eventually became the chief of planning for Housing and Community Development in Kansas City, Mo., before leaving his job to pursue a career in painting.

IN BRIEF

The Associated Press

Bobby Jones movie in the works

An Atlanta film company plans to produce a feature-length movie about the life of famed Georgia golfer Bobby Jones.

The film, called "Stroke of Genius," will take place in 1930, the year Jones won golf's Grand Slam, with victories in the British Amateur, the British Open, the U.S. Amateur and the U.S. Open. He retired that year.

Shooting will begin next March in Atlanta, according to the project's production company, BJ Film.

Country music group auctions autographed guitars to raise funds

A nonprofit organization, formed to honor the role of Bristol, Va.'s in the birth of the country music genre, is auctioning three autographed guitars to raise money.

The group, the Birthplace of Country Music Alliance, hopes to raise as much as $30,000 from the auction of the Martin guitars, which have been signed by more than 30 country musicians.

The guitars — all new instruments bought at a local music store — have retail values from $3,729 to $5,399.

The auction, on the eBay Web site, ends Nov. 24.

The alliance is working to memorialize a series of recording sessions in Bristol, Va. in 1927 that introduced artists such as the Carter Family, Jimmie Rodgers and the Stonemans to a national audience.

Featured autographs on the guitars include those of June Carter Cash, Carlene Carter, Patsy and Roni Stoneman, Charlie Daniels, Loretta Lynn, Earl Scruggs and Little Jimmy Dickens.

Road Show gives students chance to match wits with school's celebrities

JJ Duncan

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students will have a chance to get in the ring and match wits with the likes of Pat Bosco in a Wednesday quiz show in the K-State Student Union.

Bosco, dean of student life, is just one of the celebrity guests appearing in Union Program Council's Game Show Road Show.

Kelly Ernst, junior in mass communications, is coordinating the event.

She said the game will consist of eight 15-minute rounds, each with four different contestants, with prizes awarded to all contestants.

"We have prizes from Varney's, like hooded sweatshirts and K-State lamps and clocks," she said.

"Every contestant will win something, but first place wins prizes valued between $70 to $80, and the values go down with how you place."

The Game Show Road Show will be brought by All Star DJ, and the president of the company, Dave Lewis, will act as host.

The stage consists of four podiums with buzzers with lock-out capabilities so that once one person buzzes in, the others can't, Lewis said.

Ernst said places were still open for contestants, and some will be kept open so that spectators will get a chance to participate in the show.

The Game Show Road Show

When and Where:
From noon to 2 p.m. Wednesday in the K-State Student Union Courtyard.

Lewis said he has taken the game show to a variety of events, such as conventions, reunions and even bars.

"Our first show was in March, and we've been doing three or four shows a month since then," he said.

Lewis said the quiz game can be tailored to suit specific events, with questions about different eras and areas of knowledge. For Wednesday's show, questions will be asked about pop culture, music, history, and K-State.

This is the first time the show has been brought to K-State, but Ernst said if it is well received, UPC will consider bringing it some other time.

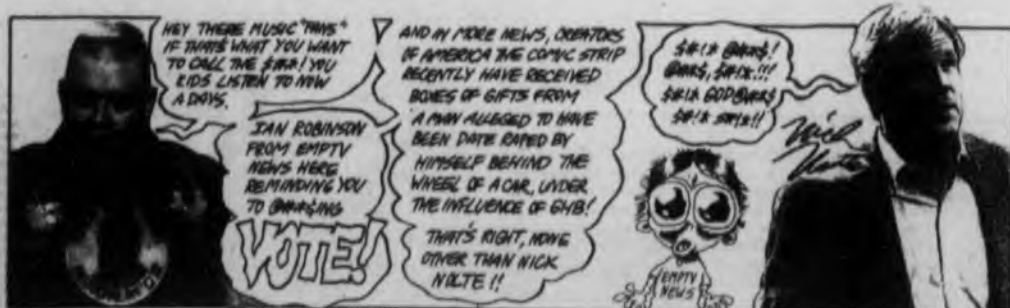

Wherever he takes the show, Lewis said he has been surprised at how attentive audiences become.

"If you watch a TV gameshow, you're always yelling at the contestants, thinking you could do better, and these shows get the same reaction, but people can play along if they like," he said.

"I enjoy the reactions of the contestants because I never know what to expect out of them. Everyone there can feel like part of the show."

get that straightened out. "I wonder if, since they still have me registered there, I can vote twice. I hope not — we could have a Florida thing happen here." In addition to student leaders taking part in Manhattan elections, university administrators have remained active. President Jon Wefald, Provost James Coffman and Dean of Student Life Pat Bosco all have been active voters since the mid-1980s, according to Riley County Clerk's records. "When I was a K-State student in the '60s, we led the Midwest in making sure politicians knew how important it is for 18-year-olds to have the right to vote," Bosco said. "The sorry state of 18- to 22-year-old voters not having great participation has hurt us as a university for funding, and on other issues important to that age group." For example, Bosco said the drinking age still might be 18 if college-aged voters took a more active role in voting. Cook agreed voting is important for college students, and said students should take steps to ensure they will be available to vote.

"I was still registered in Meade County for this year's primaries," Cook said. "But I forgot to sign up for an absentee ballot, and I was in Israel on the day of the primaries." Cook said many key issues in Tuesday's elections are important to college students. Sales tax increases, for example, could affect students because they have to buy a lot when beginning college or buying a new house. O'Hara said it is always important to vote. "It's a civic duty," he said, "not only for students but for Americans in general. Each vote directly affects the future."

when she finished the race, she felt like she was breathing out of a straw. Mortimer wasn't the only Wildcat to leave the dramatic finish at home. Cole said Erin Mortimer and Trisha Culbertson also ran steadily, but lacked that extra push to move up. He said they ran solid races but were not as aggressive as possible. Their performance, coupled with the sickness of Shauna Burrell and an injury that forced junior Cate Holston out, amounted to a seventh-place finish. The men were equally disappointed. Going in, Cole had been hoping to solidify a spot in the upper half of the Big 12, but on Saturday, he saw that goal slip away as the team finished 10th. Outside of Chesang, the Cats were unable to place a runner in the top 30. Freshman Drew Tonniges finished 37th. For the Wildcats to have done well, Cole said Tonniges needed a stronger race. "Drew ran steady but just maintained, like he fell asleep," Cole said. "I know he is capable of placing high, but he just wasn't able to keep moving." The underwhelming finish might have disappointed the men this season, but it could set the groundwork for a strong run next season. Six of the K-State men who competed on Saturday were freshmen or sophomores. And now that all the Cats have experienced a big time Big 12 Championship, Cole said, the team should be more ready for the challenges of next season. "The guys are young and inexperienced," he said. "You can talk about a Big 12 Championship, but until they actually go there and race, they won't understand."

he said. "We know what kind of team we have, and we just wanted to come out and prove that we're not a fluke," Roberson said. "We've got what it takes to win big games, and if we stay consistent, we'll be all right." What Roberson remembers most about Saturday's game, though, was the way he was able to get out of the gates quick, and forget about the fluke in Baylor. "It was real important for me because we got off to a rough start offensive wise against Baylor," he said. "We were just flat, and we tried to get it up, and once we got going we were all right." "No matter what the record of the team, we just want to go out and get on a consistent basis as a team."

Bush to propose revised resolution this week

By Barry Schweid
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration has completed a new round of negotiations with critics of its tough stand on Iraq and plans to give the U.N. Security Council a revised resolution this week. On Monday, State Department Spokesman Richard Boucher said that the administration hoped for council approval within two days after the resolution is submitted.

At a one-hour White House meeting, Secretary of State Colin Powell discussed the planned revisions with Vice President Dick Cheney, Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld and Condoleezza Rice, President Bush's national security adviser. A senior administration official said the votes of Russia and France remained uncertain. He also said he did not know that anyone was doing a victory dance, yet. The revisions go a long way toward taking into account the views of other countries, Boucher said. He added that the "bottom line" of the U.S.-British draft under discussion for two months had been retained. France, Russia, China, Mexico and other members objected to threatening Iraq with war at least until after U.N. weapons inspectors have been dispatched to conduct new searches for hidden caches of chemical and biological arms in Iraq.

Yes, the students are back in town. They're also spending money to furnish their living spaces. They're shopping in the Kansas State Collegian classifieds. Call to place an ad today. 532-6555.

the past as being better than today's players. It is a different game than it was 50 years ago.

2. Handle labor negotiations in closed sessions

This should include individual player contracts. I couldn't tell you how much George Brett made, but I am sure he was worth every penny. When I see Mike Sweeney step to the plate, I see a guy who makes $11 million a year. Players are seen as salary amounts. And that ticks off fans who make less than that.

3. Sign autographs once a week

Designate your worst attendance night as autograph night. Two hours before the game, set aside 30 minutes for fans to get autographs. It would promote a huge connection between players and the fans.

4. In Kansas City, bring back general admission

GA at The K used to be a working man's box seat. Today, it has been relegated to the upper level, just short of nosebleed seats. Granted, the game has changed, but make either left field or right field GA. You would have a true home field advantage.

5. Develop a community presence

The Royals have an owner who lives in Arkansas, a general manager from Florida and a manager from the Dominican Republic. How do you make this team closer to the fans? It doesn't work. These people need to be entrenched in the community.

Those are five things to fix baseball. The bottom line - it is time baseball take a page from football in selling the game.

final race of the day, pitting the schools' varsity eights against each other. The K-State boat was down as many as six seats in the first 500 meters, but rallied to win by six seconds.

"This serves as a reward for our girls," Hale said.

"It shows them that they have the capacity and talent to win but just need to put it together on a consistent basis."

Though this weekend serves as a showcase for the team's talent, the Cats know they are still far away from where they want to be, she said.

"We've been fighting in the top 25 or 20 boats all year, but we want to push into the elite," Hale said.

"Beating KU will not get you into the NCAA's but neither will beating K-State. We need to find that extra 1 percent and cross over to the elite."

Hale said she was surprised at her team's performance and the lack of performance KU put out.

"I was surprised they did not do better in the four events," she said. "I expected them to do better in the novice as well."

This weekend didn't just give the Cats a win, it also gave them confidence, she said.

And it's that confidence they will take with them as they prepare for the spring season, Hale said.

"We talk about momentum, and we gained some of that this weekend," Hale said.

"In each race, there is a point where if you want to sacrifice 45 to 50 seconds and get a visual lead on a boat, you can break their backs."

INCREASE | If passed, tax proposal would be used for city economic development, county improvements

be beneficial, especially after the city's decrease in economic developments.

In the past couple of years, there has been a population decline of a little more than 6 percent, he said. In addition, city officials have seen a decline of more than 10 percent in USD 383, which covers the schools of Manhattan and surrounding communities.

"We're a big supporter because there are a lot of economic concerns that face this county," he said. "We feel we need to do something to jump-start the economy."

The proposed improvements to county roads and bridges could help the city's failing economy as well, Butler said.

"For economic development, you have to have good roads to get people to their jobs and have commerce occur," Butler said. "That's a key part to economic development."

While Butler strongly supports the half-cent tax increase, he does realize the confusion and debates among county residents.

"The key element in the confusion is that the voters said they want a sunset to the sales tax, and there is a sunset," he said. "They also wanted to make sure that the money would go to the purposes listed on the ballot, and they are going to do that."

In addition, Butler said some residents have been confused about when the half-cent tax increase will take place if passed.

"This is not going to be an increase in the sales tax in Manhattan and Riley County," he said.

"This sales tax will only go into effect after the new Law Enforcement Center expires. That is key."

Commissioner concerns

City Commissioner Brad Everett is concerned when it comes to the description of the tax increase on the ballot.

He said he feels that the words on the ballot will be the deciding factor of whether or not the box is checked.

"I'm supportive to the development, but I'm just a little leery of the language that's provided on the ballot," he said.

In addition to the ballot, Everett said he is worried about the division of the tax money between the county and the city.

"The county has publicly come out and said they do not want to come out and spend another dollar outside of county lines," he said. "I feel very uncomfortable by what's been said about not wanting to see dollars spent outside this existing county. Manhattan has to think larger than just from city limit to city limit."

Everett also said he was against letting an economic project fail.

"I was opposed to having it go back and have an economic development go down in defeat," he said.

While Everett said the city should consider how to increase economic development, he believes that the sales tax is another expansion from the one for the Law Enforcement Center.

"Once we've fulfilled our obligations in paying that off and sales tax drops back down, we're simply reenacting another sales tax to go back on," he said. "I simply think it's a continuation."

However, with all of his concerns, Everett does foresee the bill eventually passing.

"I think it will pass, but it's just like a lot of Senate elections," he said.

"It's anybody's guess, but I'm just going on what I have been seeing."

Other activities included a three-legged race and a human sundae, in which contestants decorated a teammate with chocolate, caramel, chocolate chips, nuts, whipped cream and a cherry.

"The messier the better," said Kevin Gates, graduate student in college student personnel and adviser for the Association of Residence Halls.

Scott Tystad, senior in golf course management and member of the Strong-Smurtherwaite-Smith team, said he had fun at the Crazy Cat Kickoff and that he enjoyed rooting everyone on.

"This event promotes unity between the halls and especially relationships within the halls," he said. "My group has really come together - we didn't even really know each other until tonight, and now we are having a great time."

Julia Haney, sophomore in financial services and social coordinator for ARH, said the event is designed to create student interaction.

"This promotes participation within the university. A lot of times, residence hall students don't get a chance to get involved in a lot of things, and this offers them a chance to meet students from all over campus and have fun," she said.

Haney said participation in the Crazy Cat Kickoff is an important part of the week-long Homecoming celebration.

"This promotes not only participation but also Homecoming spirit. We work all week long to build up spirit for the game and the Crazy Cat Kickoff is a huge part of that," she said.

Jeans popular with college crowd; help available to find perfect fit

By Sarah Rice
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Jeans are worn with blouses, sweatshirts, sweaters and polo shirts. They have become the staple of the American wardrobe.

Jeans first began in American mining camps and have been around since then, said Sherry Haar, professor of apparel and textiles.

"It is the comfort clothes," she said. "The nice thing about jeans is they offer a variety for all ages and sizes."

At The Buckle, Lucky Brand jeans are a favorite.

"For women, it's Lucky Wonderfit," Assistant Manager Jason Stoltz said. "It is like a universal fit. It fits everybody."

He said the Lucky Husker is popular now along with Todd Oldham jeans and Silvers.

For men, Stoltz said the most popular brand is Mauvie. Sherry Haar, professor of apparel and textiles, said washed-out jeans are rising in popularity.

"It is a big trend to have some type of bleach or some type of color removal effect so it looks worn," Haar said.

But some jeans, like Lucky, don't come without a cost.

"Some people are a little more speculate to pay," Stoltz said. "If you take a pair of Lucky jeans and a pair of Silvers, the denim is so much better. Lucky is made in America. There is a lot more that goes into them that makes them $78."

The perfect jean isn't always easy to find. Meghann Martin, junior in political science, owns three or four pairs of jeans but finds shopping a challenge.

"I am kind of short, and they are too long sometimes," Martin said.

"Levi's are pretty good — that's pretty much it. I don't go jean shopping too much. I find a pair and stick with it for years."

Marla Day, instructor in the Department of apparel, Textile and Interior Design, said consumers shop for style or price and rarely ever consider the quality of material.

"Most people don't shop by quality — they shop by price or style," she said. "Then, they will base that decision on how well it fits their body. Then, they will probably look at quality. These other things are really going to be a higher priority."

Stoltz said The Buckle staff can find a jean for every body type, and if it doesn't fit just right, they offer free alterations.

"We do carry shorts, which is a 32-inch inseam, but some people need 28 or 29," Stoltz said. "We don't carry that. We carry up to 37-inch inseam, and that works out really well."

"We have a different jean for all body styles. We don't have too much of a problem with anybody."

All people have trouble finding jeans that match their body types, Day said, but there are many ways to increase a person's chances of finding a good fit.

"Even people that are really skinny have trouble finding jeans that fit," she said. "There are certain things you can do to minimize figure flaws. Wrinkle and folds in clothes always point to the spot where the problem is. If the crotch is too tight, there will be wrinkles along the top of the leg."

Day said consumers are used to having clothes that don't fit, but trying on different sizes can help eliminate the chance of buying a pair of jeans that doesn't look right.

"A lot of people have gotten used to their clothes fitting that way and don't realize that if they moved up a size, they could look better. Don't let the size label dictate whether they are good for you or not."

Another technique to use when trying on a pair of jeans, Day said, is to sit down in the dressing room.

"Whenever you are buying pants, always sit down in them," Day said. "Are they still comfortable when you stand back up? Do you have to pull up your undies? Those are things you shouldn't have to do when you stand up."

Stoltz said that when shopping for jeans, customers should let the employees assist them.

"The best advice I can give would be just let us help you," he said. "There are so many different styles and types that we have. You can tell me what you want, and I can guarantee I will find it for you."

Students match hair dos with personality to enhance image, complement clothing

By Paul Restivo
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

From the textured locks of Rachel from "Friends" to Farrah Fawcett's flips, Hollywood stars are setting trendy hairstyles.

And the college students are heading to the beauty salons to mimic them.

"Everybody wants Rachel's hair," said Wendy Schon, artistic designer for Design Expert Design Team in Aggieville.

Schon said college students are usually among the first to continue the hairstyle trends that celebrities make enviable. "College girls especially are looking for something new," Schon said.

"As soon as they get away from home, they want a change."

Schon said the changes she has seen are complementary to the latest clothing trends.

"All the clothes are fairly feminine," she said.

"Therefore, the hair tends to be feminine, with healthy, shinier hair and lots of dimension and color."

Red, auburn and golden highlights are among the most popular colors, with hair length for women tending to be shorter in the back and longer in the front.

"This style really goes with the clothing trends,"

Schon said.

"I'm seeing lots of texture, and the curl is coming back as well."

Lori Finch, freshman in open-option, recently chopped her locks to just below the ear, something she's not used to.

"My hair was long and straight and went to the middle of my back," Finch said.

"I curled it and put in highlights. I just needed something different. I've had the same hairdo since junior high."

Finch said the new look is important to her because she wants to stay away from the high-school girl look.

"Image is really important, I think," she said. "And that all starts with a person's hair. It's one of the first physical characteristics of a person that I tend to notice."

It's for that reason that Josh Brady, sophomore in business, also did a slight hair makeover this fall.

"It seems more important these days that guys have stylish hair," Brady said.

"I've gotten quite a few compliments, so I guess it was worth it."

Brady cut his hair to finger-length and added golden highlights.

"My girlfriend watches a lot of soap operas," he said. "She's in love with some guy with the hairstyle that I have since adopted."

Brady's conversion to the soap-star look is something men are doing a lot more of and, Schon said, men are paying more attention to hair lately.

"Guys are especially using color more so than ever," she said.

"Men want change, too. They get bored."

Hairstyles also are more diverse than ever, Schon said, and she's liking it all.

"I'm seeing a lot of everything," she said, "and I'm having fun with everything I'm seeing."

So, whether it be the flipped-back look, more texture, or a splash of highlight, Schon said not to be afraid to try something new.

"It can be as subtle or as dramatic as you want it to be," she said.

"Try some color. It doesn't have to be a permanent thing."

Eating disorders often signs of underlying emotional problems

By Nancy Foster
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

At 5 feet 8 inches, she weighed 87 pounds.

The nerves in her heart were starting to unravel, and her pulse was so low it set off heart alarms when she slept. Her heart rate was only 30 beats per minute. The average is 70.

Lisa, a senior in family studies who wished to remain anonymous, was anorexic and about to die.

She was just 14. Depression and suicidal thoughts consumed her. She was not getting along with her parents, and she wanted some control. She found it through food restriction.

"It became a control thing," Lisa said. "I felt very out of control with most things, but I thought, 'I can control this.'"

She said she sought attention from her parents, and her eating disorder accomplished it. When she was sick, they paid attention to her. It was her way of expressing her feelings, because she did not know how to express them verbally.

"I wanted my parents to see how bad I felt," Lisa said. "I didn't think they were listening, so I wanted to show them how bad I felt on the inside."

She was a perfectionist, she said, and she was good at disguising her disorder.

Though she stopped eating to get attention, it developed into her coping mechanism for family stress.

Dorinda Lambert, associate director with Lafene Counseling Services, said eating disorders often are a sign of underlying problems.

"When a person might be presented with the symptoms of an eating disorder, it's likely really highlighting that there's lots of other things going on," Lambert said.

Family problems are one of many things. Often, it's a distorted body image.

Lambert said people with eating disorders often express their feelings through their disorders because they do not know how to share them directly.

Where to get help

■ Lafene Health Center's Nutrition Services: 532-6544

■ University Counseling Services: 532-6927

Read more about eating disorders online at www.kstatecollegian.com.

"It's a way to try to deal with things," Lambert said. "It's not effective. It's destructive, but it's how they try to deal with things."

There are three main types of eating disorders: anorexia nervosa, bulimia nervosa and binge eating disorder.

People with anorexia nervosa starve themselves in order to lose weight. They have an intense, irrational fear of body fat and weight gain. They become obsessed with food and are determined to become thin — even to the point of emaciation.

"They believe they are very fat, but people who look at them can see that they risk their health and life because they are so thin," Lambert said.

Dianna Schalles, registered dietitian with Nutrition Services at Lafene Health Center, said anorexics will chew gum — just to be chewing — or they will drink diet beverages so the carbonation will fill them up. They attempt to eliminate all calories from their diets.

People who suffer from bulimia nervosa also tend to have poor perceptions of their bodies. However, they do not completely restrict their diets. Instead, they binge eat and then purge. Typical purging methods are vomiting, laxatives, diuretics and exercise. Bulimics want to do anything possible to rid their bodies of calories they take in.

Schalles said it is a misconception, though, that laxatives can prevent weight gain. The body absorbs most nutrients from the food by the time the laxative works. Therefore, the "weight loss" is actually water loss, or dehydration.

Schalles said family problems, low-self esteem and certain personality traits can predispose someone to developing an eating disorder.

She said anorexics tend to be perfectionists who like to be in control of everything. They are secretive about their disorders, and until a certain point, do not feel they have a problem.

Bulimics tend to be impulsive and often are more up front about their disorders. They know their behavior is abnormal, but they want to lose weight.

People with a binge eating disorder usually are very aware they have a problem. Binge eaters consume massive amounts of food, but they do not purge.

While eating disorders can occur among men, about 90 percent of documented cases occur in adolescent and young women, according to the National Institute of Mental Health.

Schalles said most eating disorders begin during adolescence. That is a crucial time because of body image and influential peer groups.

Schalles said treating an eating disorder includes seeing a psychologist, a physician and a nutritionist. The pivotal moment in treatment is when the person realizes he or she has a problem and decides to seek help.

Lisa decided to seek help after seeing a picture of herself at 87 pounds.

"I freaked out," she said. "I thought, 'I do not look like this. This is disgusting.'"

It looked like she had cancer, she said, like she was dying — which she was.

Today, Lisa said she no longer struggles with the disorder. Her last hospital visit was at the end of eighth grade, and she has not struggled with anorexia since she started college.

"It wasn't easy," she said. "It was a goal. I didn't want to think about food anymore, so I had to make it a goal of not thinking about it anymore."

And, she made a decision. "There are only two ways it is going to end. You are either going to die, or you will get over it," she said.

Lisa chose the latter.

Laser surgery available to improve vision; procedure effective in 90 percent of cases

By Dan Smith
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After years of fumbling with contact lenses and hassling with eye glass prescription changes, Andy Brinker was ready for a change in the fall of 1999.

"I couldn't see anything," Brinker, junior in criminology, said. "I was pretty much blind without my glasses."

While investigating different vision-correction methods, Brinker stumbled upon laser in-situ keratomileusis (LASIK) and an opportunity to escape the annoyances of contacts and glasses forever.

"I kind of ended up being a guinea pig," Brinker said.

A doctor at The Eye Care Center in the Kansas City area offered to perform the procedure on both of Brinker's eyes for $1,000.

During three informational meetings, he learned about the process. An ophthalmologist would create a flap of skin on his outer cornea using a microkeratome — similar to a motorized knife blade. Then, a computer-controlled laser would remove a small amount of corneal tissue. Finally, the surgeon would replace the flap to its original position.

Despite the use of lasers, Brinker said he wasn't afraid.

"Everybody I talked to said the doctor was good," he said. "I was a little nervous because it was something new, but I really wasn't scared."

In less than 15 minutes, the surgery was over, and after a four-hour nap, Brinker could see the difference already.

"It was nice not to have to deal with glasses anymore," he said.

Dr. Richard Schroeder, an optometrist at The Eye Doctors in Manhattan, said Brinker's LASIK success story isn't unique.

"That's the goal — 20-20 vision every time," Schroeder said.

"It's extremely accurate. The goal is to reduce dependence on glasses, and that goal is achieved with good candidates most all of the time. It is extremely accurate."

In fact, Schroeder said, nearly nine of 10 LASIK cases are successes.

"Some people just heal differently than others, so there's a 10-percent chance of someone needing a retreatment," he said. "They'll actually regress slightly where they will need a little bit more of the procedure, so we go in and touch that up."

Michelle Rosebrough knows that feeling.

In 1998, Rosebrough, graduate student in sociology, had the procedure done to cut down on her $50-per-month contact lens bill.

"I wore disposables, and you had to change them every two weeks, or you'd end up with eye infections," she said.

After her $3,000 LASIK surgery in Davenport, Iowa, Rosebrough said she could notice improved clarity almost immediately after the surgery. But soon her vision began to worsen.

"I went to an eye doctor here, and they showed that my vision was a lot worse than it had been," she said. "It was 20-15 in my left eye and 20-20 in my right eye. I was actually prescribed to wear glasses again."

As a result, Rosebrough will undergo another $400 surgery during Thanksgiving break to correct the previous procedure. Unlike Brinker, though, Rosebrough is a little scared.

"I'm a little nervous," she said. "But when I get it done, I'll be so happy not to have glasses, not to have contacts, to be able to wake up in the morning and see."

And that feeling, Brinker said, is well worth the wait.

"If you've got the money, it's definitely worth it. It was something I would definitely do again, and I'm 100 percent happy with mine," Brinker said. "I'm absolutely thrilled with it."

LASIK surgery

Ophthalmologists and patients agree that laser in-situ keratomileusis (LASIK) provides a level of eye-care convenience unmatched by contact lenses and eye glasses. The process is described below:

Step 1: Anesthetic eye drops are applied to numb the eye for surgery, and the surgeon marks the cornea with water-soluble ink to guide replacement of the flap.

Step 2: The surgeon applies a suction ring designed to hold the eye steady and checks the pressure of the eye.

Step 3: The surgeon raises a thin layer of the cornea with the microkeratome to expose the portion beneath. This part of the procedure is called keratotomy.

Step 4: The flap — the outermost 20 percent of the thickness of the cornea — is lifted and reflected to the side.

Step 5: The surgeon tests for laser alignment and walks the patient through the fixation process.

Step 6: The computer-controlled excimer laser removes the tissue under the flap and reshapes the cornea of the affected eye. In less than 60 seconds, ultraviolet light and high-energy pulses from the laser reshape the internal cornea with accuracy up to 1/4,000 of a millimeter.

Step 7: The surgeon lays the flap back into its original position and observes the eye for three to five minutes to ensure bonding.

Fitness centers offer quick workout

By Nick Bratkovic
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Brent Bloomer enjoys the feeling that regular exercise gives him.

He likes the break in monotony that exercise provides him, even if it is sometimes short.

"It just gives me more energy to do things," Bloomer, junior in business, said. "I just get a source of accomplishment from exercise. It gives me more motivation to do things."

Bloomer uses daily workouts as a break between a busy 16-hour class load and a night packed with homework.

He usually goes to the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex between 4 and 6 p.m., because it is not as crowded. In exercising, he likes to use a mix of weight training, an anaerobic exercise that doesn't use oxygen, and jogging, which is an aerobic exercise.

Most of his weight training occurs at the Rec Complex. However, Bloomer said, he enjoys jogging outside.

Bloomer said he is focused on academics but understands he would not be as successful without weight training.

"School's first, but I always try to have time throughout the day to work out," he said. "Afternoons are usually good for me. I usually go jogging, and sometimes I lift weights."

Manhattan fitness experts said students use exercise to relieve stress. With the busy lives students lead, they advocate an hour of exercise three times a week including both aerobic and anaerobic exercises.

"A good workout is 20 minutes of aerobic activity, using either walking or an elliptical trainer," said Lindsay Hardwick, Wellness Center fitness instructor at the Rec Complex. "The rest of the time is 30 to 40 minutes doing total body circuit training."

The center offers three levels of circuit training: beginning, intermediate and advanced. It also offers free consultations, where clients set up an appointment to determine which exercise routine will best fit into the person's schedule.

However, Hardwick said, quick workouts are not always the best option.

"There really is no such thing as a quick workout, because you don't want to rush through it," she said. "Really, an hour is not too much time."

In addition to traditional exercise plans, ProFitness in Aggieville, a fitness center, has started a lunchtime abdominal workout program. The 30-minute workout works the abdominal, lower back and oblique muscles. Daryl Bussen, owner of ProFitness, said interest in the program is growing. The key, Bussen said, is participants don't break a sweat, which means they can go back to work without showering.

"It is catching on. We started it six weeks ago, and more and more people are doing it," Bussen said.

He said some clients come from offices and work out for 30 minutes.

"If they can't get a full workout in, at least that ab workout is doing something. It is a legitimate workout though," he said.

The lunchtime abdominal workouts might be the latest trend in exercise. In the last few years, TaeBo has grown in popularity. Pilates, an exercise program that improves muscle control flexibility and control, was also a fad. Hardwick said she doesn't see a trendy exercise in 2002. It is just stressing aerobic and anaerobic activities.

Bloomer said he doesn't incorporate trendy exercises into his workouts. He just does what he has done since he started exercising on a regular basis while playing sports.

Today in Manhattan, he wants to bring friends with him to the gym.

"They say they want time to do it, but it is tough to get them motivated to stick with the exercise," Bloomer said.

Health officials caution supplement use

Exercise, nutritious diet also important when taking supplements

By Pete Elsasser
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Pat Ryan likes muscles. That's why Ryan, senior in public relations, takes creatine, protein, energy pills and night-time recovery pills to help improve them. He also uses these supplements because he has participated in professional bodybuilding shows. He said he credits much of his success to his regimen.

Ryan said he's been using supplements religiously for four years.

"I've always been interested in growth," he said. "Supplements reward you for your hard work. They kind of give you a needed edge to help you get better."

He said he's noticed benefits from the supplements including more strength and stamina. Ryan said he takes creatine for six weeks and then takes two weeks off. He said this period is important so his body doesn't become too accustomed to the creatine.

"During the break, I notice I don't have quite as much energy," he said. "I definitely notice a difference."

Barbara Lohse Knous, associate professor of human nutrition, said that although diet is the No. 1 way to get nutrients, there has been research that says one multivitamin each day might be healthy.

"The thought is that it might protect against disease," she said. "It's not a panacea to cure anything. It's directed more toward prevention."

Lohse Knous said it's important not to make a blanket statement about everyone needing to take diet supplements. She said the need varies according to lifestyle, gender and diet preferences, including people who avoid animal products.

"So many foods are fortified," Lohse Knous said. "You have to be careful because you can get way over the recommended amount. You could be at risk of taking too much."

Everyone should remember the rules regarding supplements because they are different from drugs, Lohse Knous said.

"Consumers shouldn't assume all supplements are safe," she said. "Consumers need to show something is unsafe before it's investigated. They're not innocent until proven guilty."

From his experience, Ryan said he hasn't noticed any negative side effects. He said he believes paying attention to labels of the products and following the dosage amounts is important.

"A lot of people are scared about these," he said. "But you really shouldn't have any problems if you just follow the directions."

Dianna Schalles, health educator and nutritionist, said she cautions people about what supplements they're taking.

"There just aren't a lot of studies out right now about most of these," she said. "Some products may feature one limited study that shows they work, but that's not enough."

Schalles said there are some promising studies about creatine, a supplement that may delay fatigue in high-intensity exercise.

"It does seem to be one right now that has some potential," she said. "It may actually help an athlete with the intensity of a workout and to do 'one more rep.'"

Promoting and educating people about a healthy diet is the first thing she advises when athletes ask her about taking supplements. She said supplements won't help if someone isn't taking in adequate calories, protein and carbohydrates.

"A lot of the perceived benefit may come from the placebo effect," she said. "But nutrition and training are the biggest contributors to success — not necessarily supplements."

Ryan said debate is overplayed about whether supplements are unfair means to contribute to athletic performance.

He said some abuse may exist among athletics, but much of the controversy is fueled by media hype.

"Supplements do help, but they don't do everything," Ryan said. "It's just that extra edge."

Kline, Biggs still waiting

By Sarah Rice
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In a race too close to be called, the Kansas Attorney General office has been left undecided. Officials will await the counting of up to 10,000 provisional ballots, which would be totaled by Friday or Monday.

Provisional ballots are given to voters whose eligibility is unclear to polling officials. With 3,354 of the 3,369 Kansas precincts reporting, Phil Kline-R led by only 3,267 votes, a 50-percent margin.

In a less-contested race, Kathleen Sebelius-D beat out Tim Shallenburger-R for the governor's seat, capturing 53 percent of the popular vote. Locally, Riley County selected Sebelius with 59.2 percent, while Shallenburger received 38.9 percent.

For state offices, the only democrat elected was Sebelius, withholding the undecided attorney general race.

While voter turnout was expected to be low nationwide,

Governor-elect says it's 'time for a change'

By Amy Preston
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

TOPEKA — When governor-elect Kathleen Sebelius-D took the stage Tuesday night, she had one thing in mind.

"It's definitely time for a change," she said to a room filled with thousands of cheering supporters.

After eight years of Republican leadership, Sebelius earned 53 percent of the vote, defeating Tim Shallenburger-R for the Kansas governor's seat. Shallenburger garnered 45 percent of the popular vote.

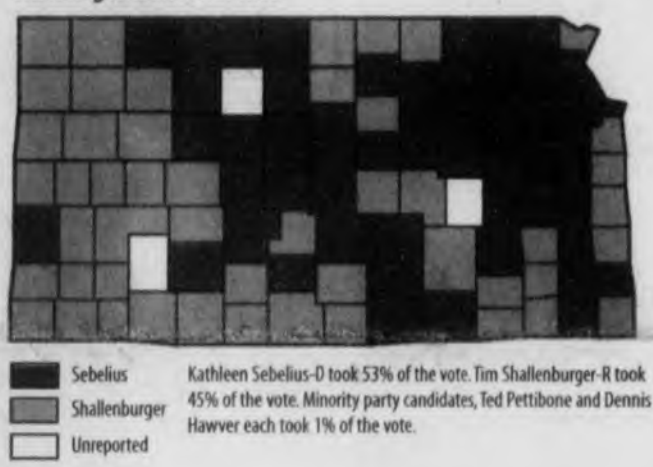

Minutes into her victory speech, Sebelius took note of the problems facing the state, stressing the importance of working together.

"We have high expectations for Kansas," she said. "Public schools are the engine of prosperity in this great state, and the health-care system is the pillar of unique quality of life."

"Together, we can work to meet those challenges. It's going to take discipline, resolve, cooperation, and patience. These are the values I'll take

Shallenburger advocates optimism in defeat

By Nancy Foster
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

TOPEKA, Kan. — He lost the race, but the crowd still cheered.

Tim Shallenburger, Republican candidate for Kansas governor, smiled, and thanked his supporters Tuesday night for their hard work during the past year.

"We're sorry," Shallenburger said. "We're sorry we let you down, but we think the cause was just, and we worked very hard to try to win. But it didn't happen."

Shallenburger, the current state treasurer, built his campaign around eliminating wasteful spending in government and providing adequate state funding without raising taxes.

Shallenburger lost the race by about 8 percent, ending his 16-year political career.

Despite the loss, he said Kansans should remain optimistic about the future.

"I think what we need to do now as Kansans is to remember we have a new governor, a new beginning for Kansas, and we should hope and pray that Kansas will be better tomorrow than it was last week."

Shallenburger told a room full of supporters that he called and congratulated Democratic governor-elect Kathleen Sebelius soon after hearing the results.

He said his plan now is to carry out the last two months of his term as state treasurer.

"We don't know what tomorrow brings, but the plan for tomorrow is we are treasurer for two more months,

Engineering dean among 3 finalists for vacant provost position at Iowa State

By Crystal Becker
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

As universities across the country fight budget cuts and scramble to fill faculty vacancies, people like Terry King, College of Engineering dean, have become a commodity.

King is one of three finalists being considered for the Vice President of Academic Affairs and Provost position at Iowa State University, a position that opened in May 2002.

Richard Seagrave, chemical engineering professor at Iowa State and chairman of the provost search committee, said the 22-member search committee received more than 100 nominations.

"We've looked over the material that applicants submitted and matched their qualifications against the university's criteria," Seagrave said. "After a lot of meetings, we've managed to narrow it down to where we are now."

If King is offered and accepts the position, it would not be his first employment at Iowa State. He was a faculty member for about 15 years, part of which he served as chair of the Department of Chemical Engineering, according to an Iowa State news release. King said the search process is still in early stages.

"The other candidates have outstanding credentials and I expect the president of ISU will be looking for specific talents in the next provost," he said.

Seagrave said the selection process is on schedule, and the committee hopes to announce a provost by the end of the second week in December.

"Hopefully, it will be sooner than that, but that has been the goal from the beginning," he said.

Seagrave said the three remaining candidates will visit Iowa State for a two-day interview to meet with students, faculty and administration. Candidates will participate in a public forum to speak about their visions for the future and respond to any questions.

Seagrave said the search committee, including the graduate student senate president and undergraduate student body president, will then collect and summarize feedback and give it to Iowa State President Gregory Geoffroy to make the final selection.

K-State Provost James Coffman said any speculation about King is premature.

"We just have to let the process play out," Coffman said. "It depends on when he leaves, or if he leaves — and I hope he doesn't. We would both likely appoint an interim dean and while that person served, conduct a national search."

Coffman said if King did choose to leave, a search wouldn't begin until early next fall, after the legislature adjourned with a budget.

"He's done a good job here, but if he does choose to leave, there is a lot of flexibility as to when. Much of it has to do with remaining commitments here and what is expected of him at Iowa State," he said.

Seagrave said Iowa State would also be willing to work with the new provost, whomever is chosen.

"The poor economy has increased the challenge of these kinds of jobs, but they're challenging everywhere, and we are looking for people to take on the challenge," he said.

King said that although he has roots in Iowa, making the move would be difficult.

"K-State is a wonderful place to work with outstanding university leadership, so leaving here would be very hard," he said.

BANTER AND BELLOW | First-date technique

Being true to self, using humor to calm nerves, guidelines for successful romantic beginnings

Don't take yourself too seriously

Layton: The best way to have fun on a first date is to not even think of it as a date. First, in preparation for your outing, roll around in the dirt for a few minutes. Play with a smelly wet dog, and spread Oreos all over your teeth. This way, your date's expectations are lowered, and she will be more impressed with the nice, simple things you do.

Going out on a first date is more like going into a land of make-believe. If you don't really know this fox too well, take her to a seriously crowded, loud place where it doesn't matter what she says. Just read the facial expressions.

If she is laughing while she speaks, just laugh back and yell, "Right on! Ha! Riiiiiiiiight on, ha ha."

If she has a serious look on her face, just scratch your chin and say, "Hmmm, I'm going to have to give that some thought." At least you'll have her attention. And do you know what that means? It means you have control, and she will soon be eating out of the palm of your hand.

(Pause for evil laugh.)

Actually, the first date is more about yourself than your date. Don't take yourself too seriously, and remember to treat your date like a good friend ... at least for a while anyway. Then, when that's played out, treat her like the sugar-mama princess you really think she is.

Tell her about the time you saved your elderly neighbor's cat from the big bad garbage disposal, or how nostalgic you get when you think about panda bears. Then rock out with a level-10 belch to put the frosting on the cake.

I'm tellin' you, it's all about keeping them guessing.

Class, etiquette top list of dating tips

Dana: You made eye contact, you exchanged knowing glances and candy-coated pleasantries, and you've got a phone number. Now it's date time.

From marriage to casual friendships, all relationships require a certain amount of etiquette. For example, you don't run over your neighbor's feet, and you shouldn't steal your roommate's beer, especially if it's expensive beer.

But a first date takes its own form. My standards lie somewhere between the strong ideals of reeling romantic and fierce feminist. So I don't expect three dozen roses, but I won't bite your head off if you open the door for me.

Other tips should just fit your personality. As for me, I usually avoid eating spaghetti on dates. I'm not coordinated enough to do the fork-spoon spinny thing — I just nibble the loose ends. And sauce usually splatters somewhere on my shirt. I am such a lady.

Also, when it comes to food and beverage, I recommend downing a bottle of wine before even starting the date. Your date will be impressed with your physical ease and ability to laugh at things that aren't funny.

OK, that's probably not a good idea, unless stumbling into New Guy's arms is your idea of a smooth come-on.

But physical contact is important. Be sure to clutch at your date's arm all night long, so he can admire your persistence. Guys like that.

Really, there is no set etiquette, and I don't believe in rules. Go on a walk, eat some grub or catch a new movie.

The best date is one where you and Guy can just chill and learn a little bit about each other. Maybe you'll exchange a few laughs and goofy stories, and, if you're lucky, a sweet little smooch.

Student ambassador elections today

Candidates hoping ability, school pride enough to earn spot as representatives

By Crystal Welborn
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Look to your left – now to your right. Would you trust the people sitting next to you to represent K-State students in front of alumni and prospective students?

If not, it's a good thing K-State has professionals for that job – the K-State student ambassadors.

"The ambassadors do a variety of things, but the biggest thing is to be a true representation of the student body for the whole K-State family," said Missy Decker-Heidrick, associate director of alumni programs.

Every year, two ambassadors – one man and one woman – are chosen to be representatives of the quality of students at the university, Decker-Heidrick said.

"The ambassadors show off what a K-State student is all about – someone who is bright, successful, does well in school, is poised, as well as represents the spirit and the K-State pride," she said.

In order to qualify for the position, applicants must go through several steps, including submitting an application; interviewing with a student-peer panel; making a presentation to a panel composed of faculty, staff and alumni; and submitting to a question and answer period.

The final four candidates – two men and two women – will be voted on by the student body today from 9 a.m. to 6 p.m. in the K-State Student Union and from 11 a.m. to 1 p.m. in the dining centers, Decker-Heidrick said.

Decker-Heidrick said she encourages students to participate in the election.

"Students should feel as though they have the opportunity to choose the people who represent them in the public eye," she said.

"Voting gives students the opportunity to feel like they have a say in who represents them, because that is truly what ambassadors are."

The four remaining candidates answered several questions about their ability to be student ambassadors.

Mandy Achilles

Achilles, junior in public relations, has been involved in Alpha Delta Pi sorority, Student Alumni Board, and the Fine Arts Council.

Q: Why is K-State important to you?

A: "I've had an awesome experience here, and it's important to continue that for new people who come here."

Q: Why do you think you would be a good ambassador?

A: "I love K-State, and student recruitment has become one of my passions. It is what I like to do, and it's easy because I love K-State, and it's a great place to be."

Q: If you could say one thing to get students to vote for you, what would it be?

A: "I love KSU, and I will promote it in the best way I can."

Blake Bauer

Bauer, junior in agricultural business, has been involved in FarmHouse fraternity, Student Alumni Board and Chimes Junior Honorary.

Q: Why is K-State important to you?

A: "K-State has an excellent environment for learning, doing extra-curricular activities and growing up to be the adult everyone wants you to be."

Q: Why do you think you would be a good ambassador?

A: "I have a strong history with K-State. I'm a fourth generation K-Stater, and I do well with dealing with adults. I feel like I would represent K-State well at all functions we attend."

Q: If you could say one thing to get students to vote for you, what would it be?

A: "I bleed purple, and I would bleed purple for everyone here and represent them well throughout Kansas."

Riley Scott

Scott, senior in golf course management, has been involved in Blue Key Senior Honorary, was a K-State Relay for Life Cancer Walk board member, and is a morale captain for K-State Up 'Til Dawn.

Q: Why is K-State important to you?

A: "K-State has been a place for new friendships, growth and development and it has been instrumental in

The K-State Student Ambassador candidates are Blake Bauer, Riley Scott, Tramine Watts and Mandy Achilles.

Jenny Braniff | COLLEGIAN

who I am today."

Q: Why do you think you would be a good ambassador?

A: "I've had a wide range of activities, from freshman football walk-on to senior Blue Key member. I also feel that I could relate to prospective students across the state of Kansas."

Q: If you could say one thing to get students to vote for you, what would it be?

A: "I would love the opportunity to represent them at alumni functions and to people across the state of Kansas."

Tramine Watts

Watts, senior in human resource management, has been involved in Golden Key International Honors Society, Student Alumni Board, and is president of the Multicultural Business Student Association.

Q: Why is K-State important to you?

A: "Three reasons why K-State is important to me are support, opportunity and leadership. Support because of the faculty and professors are making sure students are optimizing."

Opportunity because of the variety we have in knowledge development. Leadership because all clubs on campus offer practical leadership experience."

Q: Why do you think you would be a good ambassador?

A: "The value-added link I can bring through my experiences."

Individuals who are prospective students of K-State not only want to see the tangible link, but the underlying aspect that can tie them to the university."

Q: If you could say one thing to get students to vote for you, what would it be?

A: "Think about the value you want portrayed and the link you want to make. I can make that link powerful and make that connection with K-State."

NOTES

TO THE POINT Nice victory, Sebelius; don't forget promises

Dear Governor-elect Sebelius,

Your reputation as one who is committed to protecting education funding and ensuring stronger leadership for rural developmental efforts were catalysts in Tuesday night's victory.

A state that may be known for voting Republican took a leap of faith at the voting booths when its voters chose you as the leader of the state. This should help to prove that Kansans are more concerned with issues than partisanship.

Now your job begins. You've promised us many things. In a time of economic strife, and in a time when Kansas farms are struggling, leadership begins in your office.

"It's definitely a time for a change," you said.

Yes it is. We have confidence that you can carry out an effective term, one that will further the success of Kansas education, the economy and agriculture.

When you are sworn in in January, remember why you're there: for Kansans. We rallied behind you. We gave you our support.

You will still face ridicule and challenges throughout your term, but you ensured us of your strong commitment to fighting for the good of Kansas. Now it's time to carry out the promises you made.

SUNFLOWER SNUB

Famous humorist tabs Kansas 'stupidest state'

Getting my daily dose of Dave — like some people need a daily jolt of French vanilla cappuccino — just hasn't been the same since he declared Kansas the stupidest state in the nation.

I no longer thrive on pulling the top sheet off my 2002 Dave Barry desk calendar to see the next day's Barry-isms.

I simply can't seem to get excited at the thought of idolizing a nationally syndicated columnist who thinks that just because our state claims to have the world's largest ball of twine, we're the dumbest bunch of people in the Western hemisphere.

Granted, we have continuously voted to keep the most conservative Republicans in office — year after year — not realizing our problems are getting worse.

But that's beside the point.

In his Oct. 20 column, Barry wrote about the Morgan Quitno Press, which ranked the 50 states in order of smarts. This company, located in Lawrence, based its conclusions on each state's public education system — including class size, test scores and how much cafeteria food was thrown away rather than consumed.

Hey, in some states, that shows signs of being gifted.

While Barry was correct to conclude that this process only determines student intelligence, not state intelligence, I think he's just jealous that Florida — the state where he resides — came in 47th.

Aw, too bad.

Now, he doesn't fail to poke fun at his state's inability to drive, vote, drive and — did I mention drive?

But the quips about Florida pretty much stop there.

Barry moves on to focus on the fact that when rearranged, the letters in Morgan Quitno Press spell "Squirts on a Porn Gem," and that the organization has "shaky" methods of judging the states.

The fact that Minnesota is colder than a well-digger's patoot in January for 10 months out of the year doesn't mean it can't be the most livable state. And just because North Dakota has "the same population density as Jupiter" doesn't mean it shouldn't be the safest state.

So far, I'm not having any trouble with Morgan Quitno Press' outcomes.

But don't call anything yet. I'm just basing my assumptions on the exit polls.

Barry goes on to report some of the stupidest state nicknames ("The Hoosier State" tops the list here), state mottos (Washington's is "By and by"), state songs ("Here We Have Idaho") and official state "things."

This is where Kansas comes in.

Barry said we take pride in our twine because "a resident, seeking to set a world's record for largest ball of twine, spent literally years of his life wrapping twine into an enormous ball that wound up weighing more than eight tons; and then, when the individual died, the community, instead of quietly transporting the ball to a landfill and leaving it there, not only built a public gazebo to display the ball as a tourist attraction, but also created an annual festival to celebrate it."

Ouch, Dave.

Gubernatorial goobers: Election lacking qualified candidate

Yesterday was a landmark for me. It was the first time I was able to vote for a Kansas gubernatorial candidate. I had several choices. In addition to the perennial Democratic and Republican candidates on the ballot, there were two — count 'em, two — third-party alternatives.

My choice?

E.) None of the above.

Having more candidates on the ballot was a lot like having access to satellite TV: There were twice as many choices, but I still didn't want to pick any of them.

Let me do a quick rundown.

Tim Shallenburger, the Republican candidate for governor, got the smear wagon rolling with a bang in October. An Oct. 10 article in the Topeka Capital-Journal describes him as having launched the first negative campaign ad.

His ads implied that Kathleen Sebelius, the Democratic candidate, wanted to eliminate the Second Amendment, which enables Americans to bear arms.

They accused her of being soft on criminals. They even suggested that she doesn't want to prevent sex offenses from occurring.

Sebelius's campaign responded in kind, with attacks on Shallenburger's integrity and his voting record, according to an Oct. 25 article in the Capital-Journal.

Many of Shallenburger's arguments were misleading, according to the article, but Sebelius was unable to defend herself against accusations of being soft on some crime measures.

On the bright side, Sebelius' ads made me notice Shallenburger's extremely strong resemblance to an amphibian with a moustache — like Kermit the Frog meets Groucho Marx.

Throughout, both mainstream candidates attacked one another like blind, crazed weasels in heat.

Many sought to avoid the hypocrisy of the Big Two by voting for third-party candidates. The only problem with this strategy was that both third-party candidates were off their respective rockers.

Dennis Hawver, the Libertarian candidate, proposed to eliminate all new highway construction projects, according to the Capital-Journal. He further wished to pardon all non-violent drug offenders.

He was also enthusiastic about allowing law-abiding citizens to carry concealed weapons.

He was quoted as saying, "They can carry a rocket launcher for all I care, as long as they didn't break the law with it."

Reform Party candidate Ted Pettibone made the most sense to me.

He placed strong emphasis on fiscal responsibility, and he named specific areas to target for budget cuts.

Like the mainstream candidates, he also placed a lot of value on education, which I believed was important.

Unfortunately, Pettibone also had no touch with the economic realities of immigration. One of his radio ads discussed how he wanted to crack down on illegal immigrants and make it harder for them to function in Kansas.

He seemed to be under the impression that an enormous number of Kansans would be happy to take jobs now held by illegal immigrants throughout the state.

The problem is that there just aren't very many people willing to take jobs seen as undesirable. If Pettibone understood this, he would act to encourage legal immigration and find solutions for immigrants who want to work in Kansas.

So what does one do when the gubernatorial race is so full of genuine goobers?

I suppose one could always do what I did — write in Paul White. Granted, he didn't win the election, but at least my vote made a difference.

CAMPUS FOURUM | 395-4444

I just wonder how many names Bill Snyder had withheld from the sex offenders list.

As a female student, I feel I've been violated. I just discovered, thanks to the Collegian, that my male teacher is a sex offender.

I'd just like to say hey to my cracked-out, PMS-ing English teacher. She's always screwing around somehow.

The Sun-Maid raisin girl is hot.

Wal-Mart gets way too much business around here.

My pet rock ran away, and I miss it.

I think the women's basketball players are hot, and I'd date any of them.

I really think that Nicole Ohlde could take Pervis Pasco in a one-on-one game.

The guys that made me take a shot at 8 a.m. at 12th and Bertrand are the coolest.

Man, the neighbors that live in the apartment beneath us make some freaky noises when they have sex.

I wanna sex you up.

I just called to say hello.

I love you, Cory.

I've been talking so much I can see your ear running out the door.

I think I love you, so what am I so afraid of?

To the genius who writes the TBC comic: Good job Friday, except gentle is not spelled "g-e-n-t-l-e" and the word "you're" as in "You're a moron" or "You're an embarrassment to the English language" is not spelled "y-o-u-r."

KU's football team might have sucked, but its baton twirler sure drove me nuts.

Your brother's karate is a joke.

In regards to the article about the men who used pumpkins to gratify themselves, yeah, that puts a whole new spin on Halloween.

I will eat you alive. Grrrrr.

You know what's messed up? When somebody you had sex with four years ago calls you up and threatens your life.

Why is it that four boys live in a pink house?

Props to the three drunk guys who got kicked out of my psychology class Monday morning. You guys make it really easy to learn.

This one time, I went to St. Louis for a weekend, and we played Mafia the whole weekend, and this one guy cheated at every game. Yeah, that's cool. We're in college. How about we cheat on a game?

Who's that guy on Bertrand who got kicked in the stomach this morning? I don't know.

I think Crystal's the Mafia.

What's funny is that in the newspaper it says that Subway is hiring, when they're really not.

TO THE EDITOR

Campus safety questioned with sex offender as student

Editor,

I have been following with contempt and disgust the sex offender case of Akkawit Aimidilokwong through the articles supplied by this paper.

I am frustrated with a university that claims to be safety-conscious, has the appearance of being such, and yet keeps a convicted sexual predator as a student.

Every year, we have student-led groups trying to help the women of this campus feel safe and confident. This campus is host to "Take Back the Night," and at the same time, the administration allows a known attacker to continue affiliation at the expense of others.

Yes, this man is banned from setting foot on university property, but was that the only action needing to be taken? I realize K-State officials have no control over events that take place off campus, although there are other actions that could have been taken.

Why was he not expelled? He attacked a K-State student, was arrested in the K-State Student Union and was still allowed to take classes via the Internet.

In his last court appearance, he was given a continuance so that his father could come in from Asia. This means he's not an American citizen. If he had been expelled, he would have lost his student visa and been deported.

Instead, he was given more opportunities to attack others in our community.

There is a working contract based on trust that exists between the administration and students. The students and/or their parents give money and some control to school officials in exchange for education and a safe environment to live and learn in.

This gross error has violated that trust. How can students put faith once again into this system?

I wish to encourage our administration to take more decisive action now and in the future when there are predators plaguing our campus. Take care of the future of America and for that matter the world. Protect us.

This incident had made me really look at the world around me. I am so ashamed and embarrassed this has taken place at my school. Every day, I exercise in the park, and now I must look over my shoulder at the smallest noise.

I passed through the Union today and wondered, "Am I safe?"

Student groups compete in Aggieville painting contest

By Tony Herrman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

Aggieville's windows are now a display of K-State pride. Tuesday was the annual "Paint the 'Ville" competition, part of Homecoming Week.

Participants from 20 competing teams, including greek houses, residence halls and student organizations had from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. to work.

Missy Decker-Heidrick, associate director of alumni programs, said she was pleased with the outcome.

"This is fantastic. It's a wonderful display of creativity and artistic talents," she said.

Shelby Lies, freshman in biology, had a similar opinion.

"It's kinda cool getting everybody together and seeing who's good at art," he said.

Lies, who was helping members of Sigma Nu fraternity paint a window at Chipotle, is an accomplished artist.

He has completed two murals — one won a contest and was featured on a downtown Wichita window.

Courtney Campbell, senior in graphic design and a member of Alpha Chi Omega sorority, Joe Knitter, sophomore in business, paints on a window Tuesday afternoon at Chipotle in Aggieville. Knitter was painting for Haymaker and West Halls in the Paint the 'Ville contest.

ty, also has artistic experience.

"I'm an art major, so I'm pretty much the designated artist for a lot of our projects," she said.

Campbell said all the windows were well done, and she knew her team would have to set their painting apart.

"We tried to incorporate the world, Willie and K-State football into our theme," she said.

The Alpha Chi's, along with Delta Upsilon and Acacia fraternities painted a window of Zotcis Attire.

Zotcis owner, Sara Strothman, is a December 2001 K-State graduate.

"(The Student Homecoming committee) sent a letter out at the beginning of October," she said. "We wanted to get involved. It shows Wildcat spirit, and it gives us a chance to show we're still young."

Bush to submit revised plan today

By Barry Schweid
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration expects to submit to the U.N. Security Council by today a revised resolution that would force Iraq to disarm. It hopes for prompt approval.

Optimistic, State Department spokesman Richard Boucher said, "We're moving closer now to having a text that we think can gain broad support."

"We think there is growing support in the council for a strong resolution that makes clear to Iraq that it has failed to comply in the past, that it needs to comply with a tough inspection regime, that there'll be serious consequences if it doesn't," Boucher said.

If a consensus should be reached, another U.S. official said, the next step would be a meeting of the United States and the four other permanent members of the Security Council: Britain, France, Russia and China.

White House spokesman Ari Fleischer was more cautious. "There are no assurances about what will happen next," he said.

The text has been revised to reflect eight weeks of U.S. diplomacy involving France, Russia and other U.N. Security Council members that object to threatening war against Iraq if it should refuse to disarm or to cooperate with weapons inspectors.

After voting Tuesday in Crawford, Texas, President Bush ignored a reporter's question about whether he thought a compromise resolution was near.

There was a signal toward movement from a former opponent of the draft resolution that the administration hopes will clear the way to act with the support of the United Nations against Iraq's weapons of mass destruction.

Women finish 2nd at final tourney

Boucher nabs individual crown by 8 strokes

BY K-STATE SPORTS INFORMATION

Behind a record-breaking performance from junior Christine Boucher, the K-State women's golf team took second place at the Edwin Watts/Palmetto Intercollegiate. The Wildcats fired a combined score of 874 (297-291-286) to finish two strokes behind team winner Tulane.

"We played awesome today," Coach Kristi Knight said. "The conditions were there for us to score well. I always knew they could score this low — it is just getting them all to come together as a team."

The Wildcats broke K-State's 18-hole team score record each round of the tournament. The previous team record was 298, set last spring at Mountain View Collegiate. K-State's final round 286 shattered the record by 12 strokes.

Boucher's performance was the tournament's highlight. She took home the individual title, winning the tournament by eight strokes.

Her final-round 64 set a tournament record and bested the school mark of 67 she fired Monday. She tallied 10 birdies in Tuesday's round. Her combined score of 204 (67-73-64) put her soundly ahead of Hope Edge of OU (212).

"I was pretty happy with the way I played today," Boucher said. "I hit the ball closer to the greens today, and I putted well throughout the tournament."

Senior Miranda Smith also shot under par in the final round. Smith tied for seventh and grabbed a career-best 36-hole score, firing a 218 (75-72-71). Junior Karen Quintelier placed 17th, carding a 224 (76-74-74). Sophomore Sarah Hefel finished tied for 39th place. Senior Elise Capentier tied for 62nd.

The Edwin Watts Palmetto Collegiate closes out K-State's fall season.

"This gives us a lot of confidence," Knight said. "We will be able to remember this throughout the break and hopefully get us fired up for the spring."

Tournament results (final)

1. 872 Tulane; 2. 874 KSU; 3. 886 Oklahoma; 4. 904 Maryland; 5. 906 (tie) Coastal Carolina; Missouri;

Wildcat results

1. 204 Christine Boucher; T7. 218 Miranda Smith; 17. 224 Karen Quintelier; T39. 233 Sarah Hefel; T62. 243 Elise Capentier.

ROAD WARRIORS

Volleyball travels to Columbia with 2 impressive streaks in tow

By Sean Purcell
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Nine consecutive wins is enough to grab anyone's attention.

But what has gone unnoticed over the past season and a half is the fact that the volleyball team has won 10 straight matches on the road against conference teams.

That streak, as well as the other, will be put on the line tonight.

K-State (15-6, 11-2) travels to Columbia, Mo., to face off against the Missouri Tigers.

Coach Suzie Fritz said it's a no brainer — the team will have to play well to get the Tigers at home.

"We match up well with Missouri — we always have," she said. "I think they are as good as they have ever been, at least in my time here. They were very good when they were here."

On Oct. 23, the Cats swept Missouri in Ahearn Field House. But all games were close, the closest being the 39-37 game-three win to clinch the victory.

Now, though, K-State won't have the Ahearn crowd to fall back on. Fritz said the Cats will have to execute and stick to what they know in order to be successful.

"I don't think we have to do anything differently," she said.

"We want to get out of the gates fast. We want to have the ability to slow down their offense to make them a little more predictable."

"We don't want to create some new plan. We just want to play well and compete hard."

The nine straight wins for K-State include four on the road.

Cats in action

#25 K-State (15-6, 11-2) at #20 Missouri (20-4, 9-3)

When: 7 tonight

Where: Hearnes Center (13,545) in Columbia, Mo.

Radio: KMAN 1350 AM, Brian Smoller with the play-by-play

Those wins, though, have been against the likes of Oklahoma, KU, Colorado and Texas Tech, teams in the lower echelon of the conference.

Fritz said the true test of whether or not the Cats are road warriors begins now, as they face the league's cream of the crop — at their place.

"We haven't gone on the road with Texas or A&M or Nebraska or Missouri yet," she said. "Those are four of the top-five teams in the conference."

"Our test is yet to come in terms of our ability to be really good on the road. We'll know if we are good on the road by Thanksgiving. That's when it's all said and done."

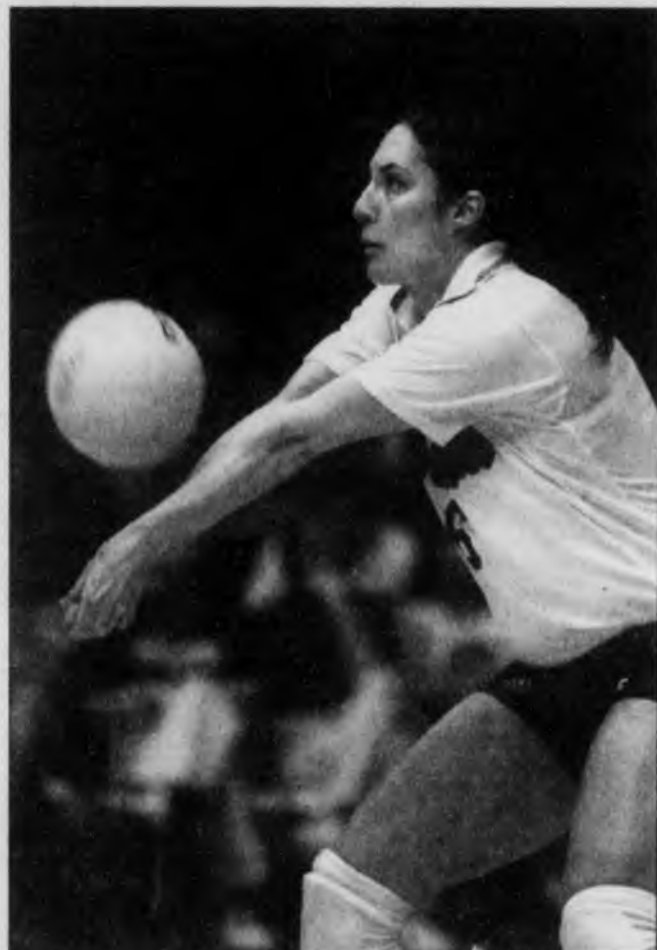

But for now, the Cats have been good on the road.

K-State is winning and getting the wins it should be getting, Fritz said.

This is due to, for the most part, how practice is run, she said.

"We try to create as competitive of an environment as we can that when they get on the road. They are comfortable because they've been there before," she said. "This team just shows tremendous composure, and they're efficient, and I think those two things are what have helped them have some success on the road."

Success is temporary, though, Fritz said, if you become lax and think things

Jennifer Pollard passes the ball Nov. 12 at Ahearn Field House. Pollard recorded 17 digs in the match as the Cats swept Iowa State 30-12, 30-19, and 30-20.

will be given to you.

And things won't be given to the Cats, she said, as they are ready to run full steam into the toughest part of their schedule, which just happens to be the final part.

It all starts with Missouri tonight.

"We're not good enough yet," Fritz said. "The wins are great, and it's a lot easier winning than it is losing for sure. But it's just about trying to get better.

"The ultimate goal is to make a run in the NCAA tournament — go as far as we can possibly go. And if we just try to get better, then good things will happen — wins for instance. It's easy to say when you've won nine in a row, but truthfully that's the MO around here. We just want to outwork people and try to get better with each and every opportunity."

K-State Sports Information

Football | ABC decision delays time announcement for K-State-Nebraska

ABC has narrowed down its six-day selection for Big 12 Conference games on Nov. 16, including the Nebraska at K-State contest that day. The network will make its final decisions regarding the Nov. 16 games on Sunday.

The matchup between the Huskers and Wildcats has been placed on a ready list for broadcast in all three possible television windows, the conference office said Monday. Other games under consideration are Iowa State at Colorado and Texas at Texas Tech.

Women's Basketball | Bramlage ticket office accepting orders for WHIT

Ticket orders are now being accepted for the first and second rounds of the NCAA Women's Basketball Championship to be March 23 and 25 in Bramlage Coliseum, K-State athletic officials announced Tuesday.

All-session tickets, good for all three games of the tournament, are priced at $22 for chairbacks, $18 for bench seats and $10 for K-State students/youth bench seats. All seating will be reserved.

Ticket orders will be accepted in person at the K-State Athletic Ticket Office in Bramlage Coliseum or by calling toll-free (800) 221-CATS. The ticket office is open from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m., Monday through Friday.

K-State women's basketball season-ticket holders and donors to the Ahearn Scholarship Fund will have priority in seating locations for the tournament. Deadline for donor and season-ticket holders to place their orders is Jan. 17. Due to NCAA requirements for participating team seating locations, season-ticket holders will not be guaranteed the same seating they have during the regular-season.

Women's Basketball | Ohlde, Wecker still garnering national attention

K-State's Nicole Ohlde and Kendra Wecker picked up a pair of honors when ESPN.com placed them among its top five centers and forwards.

Ohlde, a 6-foot-4 junior, joined Chantelle Anderson of Vanderbilt, Kara Braxton of Georgia, Vanessa Hayden of Florida and Stacy Stephens of Texas as one of the top five centers in the country. Wecker, a 5-foot-11 sophomore, joined Canton Hill of Oklahoma, Penette Pierson of Texas Tech, Aiysha Smith of LSU and LaToya Thomas of Mississippi State as one of the top five forwards in the nation.

MLB | Diamondbacks' Johnson edges Schilling, wins 5th Cy Young award

Randy Johnson won his record-tying fourth-straight National League Cy Young Award on Tuesday, a unanimous pick over Arizona teammate Curt Schilling.

Johnson, who will earn an additional $4 million because of the award, received all 32 first-place votes and 160 points from a panel of the Baseball Writers' Association of America. It was his fifth Cy Young Award, one short of Roger Clemens' record.

Schilling was runner-up for the second straight season, receiving 29 second-place votes and three thirds for 90 points. Atlanta closer John Smoltz was third with 21 points.

Johnson matched Greg Maddux (1992-95) as the only pitchers to win four straight Cy Youngs and is the NL's first unanimous winner since Maddux in 1995. Johnson and Schilling became the first pitchers to finish 1-2 in Cy Young voting in consecutive years.

NCAA | 18-year-old Bowling Green soccer player dies after collapse

A female freshman soccer player at Bowling Green died at a hospital after collapsing five minutes into a game Tuesday, a nursing supervisor said.

Leslie Dawley was away from the action when she fell during a Mid-American Conference tournament game against Buffalo.

Trainers rushed onto the field and tried to revive the 18-year-old player.

Teammates covered her with jackets before she was taken by ambulance to Wood County Hospital, where she died, nursing supervisor Mary Davis said.

Bowling Green sports information director J.D. Campbell could not confirm the cause of Dawley's death.

He said the university could not release any information before notifying "the appropriate people."

MLB | Ripken withdraws name from consideration for Orioles' front office

Cal Ripken Jr. is too busy to take on a front-office job with his former team, the Baltimore Orioles.

Ripken on Tuesday withdrew his name from the list of candidates to become the Orioles' vice president of baseball operations — a title that is tantamount to general manager. Ripken, who played with the Orioles from 1981-2001, held informal discussions with Orioles owner Peter Angelos about the VP job.

College football's weekend slate could provide best action of 2002 season

Last Saturday reminded us why we watch college football.

We love to see an upset, as long as it isn't against our team.

And if competition is why we watch, then fans got their money's worth last weekend.

We saw No. 3 Virginia Tech, No. 5 Georgia, No. 6 Notre Dame and No. 8 N.C. State all drop from the undefeated list.

In those losses, the teams who came up short learned some lessons.

Virginia Tech learned that single coverage against good receivers plus the fade pattern equals heartache.

Georgia learned that Florida, while struggling, is one scrappy bunch of Gators.

No. 8 N.C. State learned that, in the "Almost Competitive Conference," a high ranking doesn't mean you're any good. But was proven last year by way of Maryland.

But in the take-all lesson of the weekend, Notre Dame, donning green jerseys for the Boston College game, learned that changing horses in the middle of the river — with or without God's help — is never a good idea.

Others in the top 10 fared better.

Miami showed that they only had to show up for one quarter to beat Rutgers.

Ohio State sent the Golden Gophers of Minnesota to dig for ideas about getting back into the top 25.

Texas put an end to college football's longest home winning streak, again, in toppling Nebraska.

Washington State kept its Pac-10 title hopes alive by downing Arizona State, and Iowa continued to over-achieve, winning a Big Ten battle against Wisconsin.

Oh yeah, and Oklahoma kept on winning, handing Colorado Big 12 loss No. 1.

Don't be surprised if this weekend packs some punch as well, because there are some more good games on the bill.

Here's a look at this weekend's most interesting games.

No. 3 Ohio State at Purdue

Ohio State should dominate in this road test.

Interesting side note: Purdue freshman quarterback Brandon Kirsch recently got bombed at a frat party, talked some smack, and ended up punching a wall trying to knock somebody's block off.

Get this guy on the field and let's play some football.

No. 21 Colorado at Missouri

So, the Buffaloes lose a hard-fought battle against OU and must travel to the depths of Missouri to face the Tigers. Post-big-game-hangover, anyone? Buffs will either rebound, or pick up Big 12 loss No. 2.

Interesting side note: Colorado must lose three times for the Cats to have a shot at the Big 12 north. After Missouri, the Buffaloes are host to Iowa State and travel to Nebraska.

No. 1 Miami at Tennessee

Last weekend, Miami struggled mightily but rallied in the fourth quarter to beat Rutgers. Is Rutgers pretty good? 1-8, you say? What happened? No one knows, Billy. One thing is for certain, though — the 'Canes are going to have to turn it up a notch to beat a tough Tennessee team in Knoxville.

Interesting side note: Tennessee, fresh off a victory over South Carolina, is 65-3 in November since 1985.

No. 15 Oregon at No. 5 Washington State

A good chance to see a brand of football where defense means precious little.

Oregon wins in this one.

Interesting side note: Oregon junior running back Onterio Smith said he is considering entering the NFL draft next April. Hold the phone.

No. 12 K-State vs. No. 22 Iowa State

Quarterbacks with similar tools — Seneca Wallace and Eli Roberson — line up in this one. The Wildcats, on the strength of turnovers caused by heavy pressure on Wallace, win their 13th consecutive homecoming contest.

Interesting side note: K-State has won eight straight in the series.

Good games last weekend, good games this weekend. And you just never know what's going to happen.

Stay tuned, sports fans.

VIOLENT GAMES

Negative effects of video violence debatable

By J. Scott Bowman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Clad in a cabana shirt and acid-washed jeans, Tommy Vercetti sprints down the street and, trying to evade the authorities, ducks into a back alley.

He stumbles upon an unsuspecting pack of gang members. Luckily, before they can respond, Vercetti has already drawn and repeatedly fired his sawed-off shotgun.

The smoke clears, and Vercetti is unscathed. Ignoring the distant sirens, he strolls over to the corpses and picks up the leftover money and weapons.

This is one of countless situations you can encounter when playing the recently released video game "Grand Theft Auto: Vice City" for PlayStation 2.

"Vice City" is the highly anticipated addition to the "Grand Theft Auto" game series developed by Rockstar Games. The game puts you in the shoes of a gangster sent to a Miami-like city to expand a crime boss' empire.

The game, released last week, has already been widely embraced by video-game enthusiasts, said Brendon Guth, employee at Digital Shelf.

"It has been a very high-demand game," Guth, graduate student in history, said. "I think it's popular because it's one of those games that puts people in a role that they know they can't fulfill."

In the past decade, video games have progressively taken the brunt of the news media's attention when it comes to explaining the increasing amount of tragically violent events. The most significant event to be related to video-game violence was the Columbine High School shootings in April 1999, where the shooters were big fans of the first-person shooter game "Doom."

"I personally don't really buy into the idea that video games are to blame," Guth said. "Movies are far worse as far as graphic depiction of the crime world, or killing in general. I think that if parents do their job, then everything should work out fine."

He said that he has rented several copies of violent video games to parents renting for children. He added that even though the game has more illegal activity as well as violent action, his store has sold 10 copies of "Vice City" to parents purchasing it for children.

In the 1990s, Congress applied pressure to the video-game industry so that parents aren't entirely in the dark. The Entertainment Software Rating Board (ESRB), established in September 1994, is an independent rating council that rates games. The voluntary board was designed to give consumers information about games based on content.

The ESRB was formed after the increase of gory violence in video games such as "Street Fighter 2" and "Mortal Kombat." Most controversial violent video games have received the rating of "M" for mature. This means the content is suitable for people 17 and older and contains material that is violent, with possible sexual themes.

Still, thousands of concerned parents and researchers continue to wonder if violent video games are giving their children the wrong impressions.

Along with the creation of the ESRB, several psychologists have initiated studies to see the results and consequences of children's ex-posure to violence. Family Studies and Human Resources professor John Murray is one local authority who has investigated the results of media violence on children.

"There's a lot of research on media violence, which deals mainly with TV and movies," Murray said. "There are fewer studies on video games, but they know that the processes are the same. The biggest problem with violent video games is that it is more involving than movies."

Murray said there are three things that occur when children are exposed to violence: aggression, desensitization and fear. He said the first two are more commonly found as a result of video games.

"We've seen that kids start to use aggression and fight more often to solve problems," he said. "They also become more desensitized. They are less sensitive to pain and suffering of others because they see it all the time."

Most college students say they use video games as a chance to relax, have fun and kill time, but they don't see it as something that makes them more likely to be violent. Some students tend to play violent games because they offer a form of freedom, bonding and an outlet for frustration, said Travis Weigel, Marlatt Hall third-floor resident assistant.

"Normally, my residents will play a game like 'Quake' on their computers. Then, when they're done, gather in the hallway," Weigel, senior in political science, said. "They'll talk about strategies that worked and stuff that didn't work. They might trash talk a little bit and give each other a hard time, but it never really gets personal."

Parents have united in the past to help regulate violent games. In the 1976 Atari video game "Death Race 2000," based on the movie of the same title, players earned points after running over stick figures. The game was pulled from the market after parents spoke out about the violence.

In 1979, parents boycotted toy stores that sold the Atari game "Texas Chainsaw Massacre." In it, you were put in the shoes of the movie villain, Leatherface, and your mission was to chop up people with a chain saw.

Murray argues that males in their early teens are the most impressionable group of people when it comes to video-game violence. The skill and the will to kill are provided by video games, making males exposed to the games more dangerous — a result that can be seen in recent school shootings, Murray said.

"We've known that aggression can be learned," he said. "People who grow up in dangerous or traumatic households learn how and when to aggress. What the media does is it starts to take over teaching you when to aggress. And when you see it all the time, that is how you will react."

Weigel said he was concerned with the increased violence in popular culture and how children are raised. He said parenting is the key to preventing kids from getting out of hand.

"In my opinion I think it would be dumb to blame video games as the primary cause of violence," he said. "I think parents have a lot to do with how kids grow up."

"By the time I was four, I knew the difference between real and

Blood on the control pad

Here is a brief time line mapping the progress of violence in video games.

1972: "Pong" is released and is considered first video game success.

1976: Atari releases "Death Race 2000," a game where players are awarded points for running down people with cars. Parents speak out about the violent content, and the game is subsequently removed from store shelves.

1979: Atari releases "Texas Chainsaw Massacre," and players take the role of the movie villain Leatherface as they kill innocent victims. Parents boycott toy stores that sell the game.

1991: "Street Fighter 2" is released by Capcom, making fighting games an industry standard.

1993: "Mortal Kombat" is released by Midway, taking the level of fighting game violence much higher.

1993: "Doom" is released by id Software. The satanic first-person shooter is later blamed for inspiring the shootings in Columbine in 1999.

1994: The Entertainment Software Rating Board is established after pressure from Congress and parental groups. The independent rating council was designed to give consumers information about games based on content.

1996: "Quake" is released by id Software.

1998: "Grand Theft Auto" is released for PlayStation.

2002: "Grand Theft Auto: Vice City" is released for PlayStation 2, rekindling the controversy over violence in video games.

Wife gives husband TV makeover

Echo Taylor's husband wears his T-shirts until they have holes, he hasn't cut his hair since 1987, and he has to borrow a belt whenever he wants to wear his one suit.

So when Taylor, of Medford, Ore., heard that the "Live with Regis and Kelly" show was looking for women who wanted to make over their husbands for a segment called "Messy Mates," she didn't hesitate to write to them.

He maintains there's no reason a man should have to wear anything other than a T-shirt. "Not really, unless it's cold. I'm doing it for Echo."

VIOLENCE | Experts argue video game violence influences behavior

unreal, and I knew that cartoons were fake.

"Nowadays, kids grow up still thinking stuff like cartoons are real when they should have grown out of that, and that's what is scary."

Instead of affecting what children perceive as real or not real, Murray's studies, which can be found at www.johnmurray.org/tele.htm, show that video games change the way brain patterns work, making them more likely to use violence.

Murray analyzed the brain of a child who was exposed to violence.

He said that as expected, the amygdala, the fight-or-flight part of the brain, was obviously stimulated.

The surprising find was the posterior cingulate, the section of the brain that is easily accessible, was storing information.

He said the fact that these images are so easily accessible helps to explain why kids respond violently at times.

Murray mentioned that the solution to violence and video games must include parents and the video game industry.

"You have the ESRB, which is good, but the people who rate everything are part of the industry, so they may 'shave some points off,'" he said.

"But parents are still responsible for their children, and they need to know what is going on and talk to their children."

"So, the parents and the industry have to work hand in hand to limit the amount of violence their children are exposed to."

SEC chairman resigns under political pressure

By Marcy Gordon
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — Securities and Exchange Commission Chairman Harvey Pitt resigned under pressure Tuesday night after a series of political missteps that embarrassed the Bush White House just when it needed to shore up investors unnerved by accounting scandals.

In a letter to President Bush, Pitt said "the turmoil surrounding my chairmanship" had made it difficult to stay in the job. "Rather than be a burden to you or the agency, I feel it is in everyone's best interest if I step aside now, to allow the agency to continue the important efforts we have started."

The White House quickly accepted his resignation.

Three administration officials, speaking on condition of anonymity, said the White House welcomed the resignation of a regulator who had created a host of political problems for Bush in the run-up to Tuesday's midterm elections.

Pitt's troubles had been seen as weakening the SEC at a time when the market was reeling from corporate debacles, including Enron, WorldCom and Global Crossing, and the economy was fragile.

The latest fumble came when Pitt failed to share with fellow commissioners information about William Webster, the newly named chairman of an accounting industry oversight board, before the agency voted last week to put the former CIA and FBI director in charge of the panel.

The revelation led SEC commissioners, including Pitt, to request an internal investigation Thursday of Webster's selection — and renewed the almost daily drumbeat of calls from Democrats and other Pitt critics for his resignation. Webster's future as head of the new oversight board was unclear; he said this week that he would step aside if he decided he can't be effective in that job.

A senior White House official said Bush aides heard over the weekend that Pitt was inclined to resign. Neither the president nor his aides requested the resignation, but Pitt called the White House personnel office Tuesday afternoon and said he intended to resign.

There were no objections, and Pitt submitted his resignation late Tuesday afternoon. In it, Pitt said he thought the controversy was hurting his ability to lead the SEC.

Sen. Richard Shelby, R-Ala., whose criticism of Pitt over the weekend eroded his previously solid Republican support, said Tuesday:

"The process of what happened and how it happened was very troubling, and I think it tainted the whole situation."

Rep. Edward Markey, D-Mass., a longtime critic of Pitt, said that during his tenure, "investors and the capital markets have been on shaky ground."

The White House official said Bush won't have a replacement immediately. They had not begun to search for candidates as of Tuesday night and expected Senate confirmation to be difficult in the intense political climate, the official said.

Former SEC Chairman Richard Breeden was said to have been informally approached about the job, but declined. Breeden is now a court-appointed monitor for the bankrupt WorldCom.

Pitt, who first worked at the SEC in the late 1960s and built his career as an attorney in appearance-conscious Washington, has been criticized for meeting with the heads of companies under SEC investigation and for his close ties to the accounting industry — at a time when the SEC is investigating major accounting fraud at big corporations. Pitt represented the Big Five accounting firms while in private practice.

In this latest instance, Pitt withheld information about Webster's lead role on the auditing committee for U.S. Technologies, a company facing investor lawsuits alleging fraud. Webster told The New York Times that Pitt assured him that SEC staff had looked into the issue and it would not pose a problem.

Last month, Democrats asked Bush to remove Pitt, whom they accused of bowing to the accounting industry by opposing the appointment of John H. Biggs to head the oversight board.

Supporters of Biggs, a pension fund administrator, believed he would advocate tough regulation of the accounting industry.

It was not immediately clear whether Bush sought Pitt's resignation, but the White House made no secret that Bush was angered by Pitt's failure to warn the White House and chief of staff Andrew Card about Webster's role with the auditing committee.

IS GOD CALLING YOU AND GETTING A BUSY SIGNAL? do you feel a longing for more in your life?
do you radiate joy?
do you long to follow in the footsteps of Jesus?
does love pour out of your smile?
In today's world, it's so easy to lose sight of why we're really here. So perhaps the thought of devoting your entire life to God has never crossed your mind.
Then again maybe it has. Maybe you're the one of the rare women who are being called by God to follow in the footsteps of Jesus. And if you'd only take a moment to really listen to your inner voice. God will get through.
We are the Sisters of St. Joseph, an international order with roots right here in Wichita. And we invite you to come live a life of holiness, in a community where we strive for unity and reconciliation among all people with God and with one another. Ours is a community of prayer and service. Our dedication to God motivates us and is the source of joy for all that we do.
But how can you know if you truly have been called? Do you feel a longing for more in your life? Do you feel a void in your heart? Do you radiate joy? Does love pour out of your smile and do you long to follow Jesus?
If so, you owe it to yourself to answer God's call. To learn more about The Sisters of St. Joseph, call or visit us online. You'll be eternally grateful you did.

SEBELIUS | Governor-elect ends republican's 8-year stretch

when I'm sworn in January. We're all in this together and only we'll move this together." Throughout the night, thousands of supporters attended the election-watch party in Topeka, including a number of influential Democratic figures in Kansas throughout the years.

Francis Hupp, a former vice-chair of the Shawnee County Democrats, said the reason Sebelius won the election was simple.

"I think she votes for the right people," she said.

However, Hupp said Sebelius won't have an easy transition.

"I think it will be tough at first because she'll have a deficit to deal with," Hupp said. "But if she gets the right people around her, she'll be fine."

Along with her successful advertisements, Nicole Corcoran-Basso, head of public relations for Sebelius, said that her leadership role as the state insurance commissioner was key to her success.

"She has shown leadership in that role," she said. "She's not afraid to try things."

In addition, Sebelius' views on higher education gave her an advantage, Basso said.

"The biggest thing was protecting education," she said. "That helps us tremendously."

While the majority of Kansas is considered Republican, Tom Sawyer, chairman for the Kansas Democratic party, said this year's candidates increased the number of Democrats elected for office.

"Kansas is a very Republican state, it's always been an uphill battle," he said. "But we've had a great slate of candidates this year. I am proud of our candidates running."

As for the future, Sebelius plans on starting her new role as governor immediately.

"We're going to get right to work," she said. "We are about to make dramatic changes, and I look forward to serving the next four years as the next governor of Kansas. God bless this great state of Kansas."

SHALLENBURGER | Republican supporters disappointed in result increased health risks of living in southeast Kansas. At first, he thought about moving his family, but instead he decided to run for office.

"Sixteen years ago when we started, we did it for a reason," he said.

Shallenburger's supporters said they were disappointed.

Ruth Hausmann, a distance-education college student living in Atchison, Kan., and her 10 family members, all traveled to Topeka to show their support for Shallenburger on Tuesday.

"We're all disappointed," Hausmann said, "but the rest of the races are looking good, so that's a plus."

She said her family supported Shallenburger's family values and conservative views.

Every member of her family helped campaign in one form or another for him. Now, she said she is worried about what the future might bring.

"I worked with a senator last legislative session, and it was hard to see so many good initiatives that didn't get pushed through," she said, "and we're probably looking at another four to eight years of that."

K-State graduate and former student senator Bobby Allison-Gallimore, who was at the campaign party, said he was disappointed about the loss, but optimistic about Sebelius' win.

"I think she will work well with the Legislature, but I think we have a history in Kansas of working in a bi-partisan spirit," Allison-Gallimore said. "I think she'll get the job done."

However, he said Shallenburger was the better candidate.

"He really had the vision for Kansas right now, with the economic situation we are in, and I think he had the best plan to address that. The last thing we need is higher taxes," he said.

He said he hopes Sebelius carries out her promise to fund higher education.

Shallenburger ended his concession speech thanking his family and supporters.

"It's been a wonderful ride for 16 years for Tim Shallenburger in the state of Kansas," Shallenburger said. "Thank you very much, and God bless you."

ELECTIONS | Voters push Riley County sales-tax extension through

Riley County reported a 49.49 percent voter turnout with 13,931 of 28,148 registered voters reporting to the polls.

State representative races in Riley County were close as well. Sydney Carlin-D beat out Russ Frey-R in District 66. Carlin captured 49.77 percent of the vote, while Frey received 46.96 percent. In District 67, Roger Reitz-R overcame Tom Hawk-D with 51.50 percent of the vote. Hawk received 48.50 percent.

A highly controversial half-cent sales tax for Riley County passed by 75 votes. Voting yes were 50.28 percent of voters and voting no were 49.72 percent, a difference of only .56 percent. The half-cent sales tax will continue the sales tax already in place, which will pay off the Law Enforcement Center by 2004. The new sales tax will go toward the city's economic development as well as improvements of county roads and bridges.
